Laon, the ancient Laudunum, city, France, cap. dep. Aisne, 18 m. NE. Soissons, 55 m. NW. Chalons-sur-Marne, on a precipitous limestone rock rising 650 ft. from the plain. Principal edifices, a cathedral, dating from 1155–1174; prefecture, with a valuable library; a leaning tower and citadel. L. has manufactures of nails, coarse cloth, leather, earthenwares, biscuits, &c.; and in its vicinity are numerous vineyards. Here, on March 9 and 10, 1814, a sanguinary battle was fought between Napoleon I. and the allies under Blücher. Under the French kings of the first and second races L. was a place of importance, and it remained the last possession of the Carlovingian dynasty under Louis V., the foundations of whose massive castle still remain. Its bishopric was suppressed in 1790. Birthplace of P. Marquette, the discoverer of the Mississippi. Alt. 595 ft. P. 9600.

Laopai-shan. See Changpai-shan.

Laos, series of separate and partially independent states, in SE. Asia, surrounded by or intermixed with the Burmese and Siamese dominions and French Indo-China. The name is a Chinese one, meaning 'ancient.' By the Burmese they are called Shans, and by themselves Tai, or Tai Yai ('the elder Tai'), in contradistinction to Tai Noi (the lesser or younger Tai') the name which they give to the Siamese. Boundaries, area, and population unknown to Europeans. The states traversed by the Menam and Mekong Rivs. are said to have a fertile soil, but to be thinly peopled, the inhabitants living mostly in migratory hordes. Products similar to those of Siam, to which country many Laos tribes are tributary. In habits, customs, religion, and language the Laos resemble the Burmese and Siamese; they are divided into the tattooing tribe, and the tribe who hold the practice in detestation. Their money is in the form of ingots, of impure metal, extracted from the mines which abound in the country. The people are peaceable, patient, superstitious, simple, and faithful, holding theft in horror. They cultivate rice, melons, and maize, and sell ivory and skins to the Chinese; and trade in gold dust, silver, copper ores, gums, lac, wax, and dye-wood in exchange for pottery, glass, &c. Lappmark, name of dists. in N. Sweden inhabited by Lapps.

Lapps, a people speaking a language belonging to the Finno-Tatar group, and sparsely scattered over the N. of Norway and Sweden and the NW. of Russia, including the N. of Finland and the Kola Penin. The name is of doubtful origin, but is conjectured by Egli to be a corruption of the Finnish Lappalainen or Lappalaiset, meaning 'dwellers on the frontier,' and the name seems to have been at least first given by the people of Finland. The name was adopted from the Finlanders by the Swedes, who at first called them Finns, and to this day they are not distinguished by the Norwegians from the Finns, the prov. of Norway to which most of them belong being known as Finmark. By themselves they are called Samelaiset or Suomalaiset. They are subdivided into Coast Lapps, who live by fishing (the Norwegians distinguishing also Elv-Finns or River Lapps and Sea-Finns, who fish in salt-water), and Mountain Lapps (the Fjeld Finns of the Norwegians), who lead a nomadic life, living on the produce of their reindeer herds. In Norway they are not confined to the prov. of Finmark, but extend as far S. as 62° N.

Elsewhere they are chiefly found N. of the Arctic circle. Their total number is estimated at about 28,000, of whom about 25,000 live in Sweden and Norway.

Latium, Italian Lazio, div. (compartimento territoriale), Italy, coextensive with the single prov. of Rome, about two-thirds of the size of Wales, with a coast-line on the Tyrrhenian Sea from 41° 17′ to 42° 23′ N., whence it stretches inland with an average breadth of 35–40 m. from SW. to NE.; traversed in the middle by the SW. part of the course of the Tiber, which forms the inland boundary of the N. half; occupied to a large extent by spurs of the Apennines, besides the detached Monti Albani (SE. of Rome) and further S. the Monti Lepini, cut off from the Apennines proper by the valley of the upper Liri. The div. contains the crater lakes of Bolsena, Vico, Bracciano, Albano, and Genzano. Principal cereal wheat, which occupies between two and three times the area of maize, the next in importance. The cultivation of the vine has greatly increased in recent years, vineyards now occupying more than double the area covered by them on the average of the five years 1870–74. Olive culture also considerable. The only important mineral is alum clay. L., taken as a whole, is one of the divs. of Italy suffering most from malaria. In communes occupying fully a third of its surface the deaths due to malaria on the average of the three years 1890–92 exceeded 1 per 1000, and the div. includes in the SW. the Pontine Marshes (q.v.), where they exceeded 8 per 1000. Under the amelioration laws of 1882 and 1886 drainage and other works to remedy this evil have been carried out in the pools and marshes near the mouth of the Tiber, and in several dists. N. of the Tiber and W. of Rome (Porto, Campo Salino, Maccarese, valley of the Almone), over an aggregate area of more than 20,000 ac., as well as about 18,000 ac. in the Pontine Marshes. Its rapid rise to prosperity is due to its mineral springs (discovered in 1784). It is now a favourite place of residence for retired people, on account of the beauty and healthiness of its situation, as well as the excellence of its schools. The river has a magnificent promenade along its banks. L. contains the largest manufacture of cooking ranges in the world. The Free Libraries Act was adopted in 1857. Mean rfall. (1866-80), 27.4 in. Lebanon (Libanus, 'the White Mountain'), called by the Arabs Jebel-el-Gharbi ('the White Mountains'), mt. range of Syria and N. Palestine. It begins on the S. at the ravine of the Litany (ancient Leontes), runs NNE. for about 100 m. to the Nahr-el-Kebir, which flows round its N. end. Parallel to it is the range of Anti-Lebanon (q.v.), the Jebel-esh-Sharki (or Sherki —E. Mts. of the Arabs), separated from it by the valley of Cœle-Syria, now called El Bekaa. It covers an area of about 2000 sq. m. Mean height, 6000-8000 ft.; highest peaks, Dhor-el-Khodib (10,625 ft.), ESE. of Tripoli; Sannin, or Sunnin, a little N. of the parallel of Beirut (8555 ft.); Jebel Keneiseh, or Kuneiyiseh (6665 ft.), N. of the pass on the road from Beirut, opposite which there is a higher unnamed peak (7230 ft.); Jebel-el-Baruk (7290 ft.), a few miles further S. Snow lies on the summits all summer. On the seaward side the base is formed of Cretaceous strata. The central ridge, of Jura limestone, has smooth sides and bare tops, and the scenery is of the wildest and grandest description. There are several passes across the chain, but only one well-maintained road—that from Beirut (q.v.) to Damascus. The climate of the lower and middle ranges resembles an English spring. Every available spot is cultivated up to 6000 ft. with fig trees, olives, mulberry trees, and patches of grain. Villages and convents cling to the sides of the cliffs, or are perched on the rocks in picturesque confusion. Many streams of classic fame rush down to the Mediterranean. The recesses are haunted by the jackal, hyæna, wolf, and bear. The Cedars of Lebanon, the wreck of a noble forest, occupy a platform, at the height of 6000 ft., in the centre of a vast recess in the mountains about 35 m. SE. Tripoli, on the W. slopes of the Jebel Makmel, near the village of Ehden. This is the only grove still known to exist, though others existed fifty years ago further N. The E. slopes of the range are tame and infertile. L. was assigned to, but never occupied by, the Israelites. Since 1861 the mountain has been placed mainly under a government distinct from that of the vilayet of Syria. The area of this dist. or mutessariflik, which embraces all the western slopes of the range and part of the eastern slopes and of El Bekaa, is 2200 sq. m. The governor, who, in accordance with an agreement with the great powers, must always be a Christian, has his seat at Beit-ed-din or Bteddin (34 m. SE. Beirut, near Deir-el-Kamr) in summer, and at Baabda (6 m. SE. Beirut) in winter. The inhabitants are mainly Maronite Christians, but include also a considerable proportion of Greek Christians, and a few Mohammedans, formerly also in the S. a number of Druzes, though these have mostly quitted the dist. since the establishment of Christian rule. The rearing of silkworms and production of silk is the chief industry. There is very little forest land. Coal-mines exist, and extensive deposits of iron ore occur. The iron mines of this dist. were in ancient times celebrated for the fine steel they produced. Education has made great advances since 1861. P. 245,000 (Cuinet).

Leeds (Saxon Loyder, Loides, Ledis, Leedes, probably named after a British chief, Lede or Leod), parl. and mun. city and bor., co. bor. (all conterminous), W. Riding, Yorkshire, on the Aire, 186 m. (by rail) NNW. London, 21 m. SW. York, with stations on G. N., L. & NW., M., NE., and L. & Y. Rlys. The town lies chiefly in a crescent-shaped valley, just above the place where the Aire emerges from the last spurs of the Pennine Chain upon the level plain of York. The Town Hall, opened in 1858, is a rectangular pile, 250 by 200 ft., on an elevated platform, its four façades enriched with Corinthian columns. The Yorkshire College, established in 1874, was in 1887 affiliated to the Victoria University. New buildings have been erected at Woodhouse on a site covering 3⅜ ac. The departments in operation, and fully equipped, include chemistry, engineering, physics, biology, textile, and art, with a large experimental dye-house. The medical department, a school of high repute, is located near to the L. Infirmary. In 1891 a day training-college for male Queen's scholars was established as a branch of the College. The grammar school, originally founded in 1552, and later endowed by Mr. Harrison, is situated on the edge of Woodhouse Moor. There are several almhouses, of which the Harrison Almshouses, as well as St. John's Church, a very rich foundation, are due to the munificence of Mr. John Harrison. There are various medical charities, including a well-endowed infirmary, and various special hospitals, including a fever and a smallpox hospital belonging to the corporation. The corporation have provided, at a cost of nearly £270,000, a fine system of markets, including a large cattle market well situated for railway communication, fruit, fish, corn, and general markets. They also own the gas and water-works. The principal places of public recreation are Roundhay Park, area 774 ac., about 3 m. from the town, acquired by the Corporation in 1872, Woodhouse Moor, Hunslet Moor, Ivy House Estate, East End Park, Armley Park, and Kirkstall Abbey, the last bought and presented to the borough by Colonel North in 1888. The position of Leeds on the edge of an extensive coalfield, and near to an agricultural and grazing district, its communication with the sea —E. by the Aire (made navigable to L., 1659) and the Humber, and W. by the Leeds and Liverpool Canal (completed in 1816) and the Mersey—and the facilities for railway communication with all parts of the country, have contributed to its eminence in manufactures. The first mention of its leading industry, the woollen, occurs in a record of 1373; but it was probably not till the 16th century that it was firmly established. Towards the end of the 17th century the arts of fulling, dyeing, and bleaching were introduced, goods having previously been sent to Holland to be finished. Steam-power, introduced in the latter part of the 18th century, and the demand for army cloths occasioned by the wars, gave a great impetus to the trade. L. is now the greatest cloth-market in the world; every description of cloth produced in England may be had there. The finest broad-cloths are manufactured, and many of the fancy cloths made in other towns of Yorkshire are sent to L. to be finished. Felt-carpeting and drugget are an important branch of manufacture. The iron industry, established in recent times, has rapidly developed, its branches including the smelting of the ore (the supply of which is facilitated by the water communication with both sides of the county), foundries, and the manufacture of machine and locomotive engines, spinning machinery, agricultural implements, tools, &c. Decorative earthenware of the finest quality is manufactured at the Burmantofts works, on an estate of 150 ac., where both clay and coal are obtained. Other manufactures are leather (a trade of great importance in the borough), chemicals, flax, silk, glass, railway-carriages, tobacco, paper, fire-bricks, brewing, brass-founding, &c. In Saxon times L. was an important place. It is mentioned by Bede as 'Loidis-en-Elmete.' By the time of King John it had increased so much in importance that a charter was conferred on it by the Lord of the Manor in 1208. Charters of incorporation were afterwards granted to the town by Charles I., Charles II., and James II., that of Charles II. being the one under which it is now governed. Except during the Commonwealth, L. was not represented in Parliament till 1832. The borough now sends five members to the House of Commons, one for each of the N., S., E., W., and Central divs. Alt. 137 ft. Mean temp. Leeuwin, Cape, the SW. point of Australia. The name was first applied to the land in the neighbourhood of the cape, which was first sighted by a Dutch expedition on board a ship called the Leeuwin in 1622. The cape was first named by the French expedition under Baudin in 1803 Cape Gosselin (after a noted student of ancient geography), but had its name changed to Cape L. by Captain Flinders. The erection on the cape of a lighthouse of the first order, to be visible for 20 m., has been decided on by the W. Australian government.

Leeward Islands, a division of the W. Indies, but not always in the same sense. By some geographers it is applied to the Greater Antilles and the adjoining islands, that is, all the islands N. of lat. 18° N., and comprising Cuba, Isle of Pines, Haiti, Porto Rico, and Jamaica, and the smaller islands of Grand Cayman and the Virgin Is.—they extend from 64° 15′ W. to 85° W.—and by others solely to the islands off the N. coast of Venezuela, the name being used in both these cases as distinguished from Windward to denote the islands not directly exposed to the trade-wind. In England the name is officially used to designate all the British islands between Porto Rico and Dominica, and including the latter, all the others to the S. being called the Windward Is. In this sense the Leeward Is. comprise the British Virgin Is., St. Kitts and Nevis, Antigua, Montserrat and Dominica, all of which are under a single governor, and have a federal legislative assembly, composed of 10 nominated and 10 elected members. Dominica, St. Kitts, and Antigua are connected by cable with the U.S. and Europe. The total value of the exports of the British Leeward Is. varies from £400,000 to £700,000. Total area, 704 sq. m. P. Leghorn (the ancient Labronis, near the site of Portus Herculis, Italian Livorno, French Livourne), a fortified seapt. city, Italy, cap. prov. L., on the coast of the Tyrrhenian Sea, lat. 43° 33′ N., long. 10° 20′ E., 12 m. SSW. of Pisa. Lies at the westward extremity of a low, somewhat marshy plain, surrounded by hills to the S. and E., but open on the N., and towards the sea on the W. It is a bishop's see, and is connected by rail with Pisa and Colle Salvetti. In the 11th century it was but a village, protected against the Saracens by a tower, and came into the possession of the Pisans, with whom it remained for 296 years. In 1399 it fell into the hands of the Visconti of Milan, and was occupied by the French from 1404 to 1407, then made over to the Genoese, who in 1421 sold it to the Republic of Florence. At this time it had a population of only 1200. The Medici steadily favoured its progress, declared it a free port, with special privileges, encouraging settlers, without distinction of race or creed. A large number of Jewish, Moorish, Greek, and other industrious refugees and traders from Spain, the Levant, and other parts were thereby attracted to L., and largely added to its population and commercial prosperity. In 1541 a canal was dug, joining L. to Pisa, and thence by the Arno to Florence. The Medicean Grand Dukes drained the marshes, extended and embellished the town, supplied it with water by means of aqueducts, and intersected it with canals, by which cargoes in the harbour discharged into lighters were stored into spacious warehouses within the town or sent on to Pisa and Florence. In 1605 L. was enclosed by a fortified wall 5800 yards in circuit, and proclaimed a city, when its population stood at 10,000. The old port being found inadequate, the Medicean port was constructed under Ferdinand I. and Cosimo II., between 1587–1621. When the line of the Medicis became extinct in 1737, the population of L. had increased to 40,000. Under the Grand Dukes of the Habsburg-Lorraine line, the magnificent works affording abundant water-supply to L. were carried out, other improvements made, and the Medicean wall pulled down in 1841, and another built 5 m. in circuit, when the town boasted a population of 79,890. In 1855 the harbour works were begun, and have been recently completed. The port has now an area of about 124 ac., with a depth of 23–33 ft. Vessels with 24 ft. draught can enter at high water spring tides, and with 22 ft. at neap tides. The dry dock has a length of 443 ft., with a depth of 23 ft. The Orlando dock-yard has also wet dock accommodation, with 2460 ft. depth of water. The trade of L. is estimated to exceed £10,000,000 sterling. L. is now essentially a modern town, commodious and healthy. It is a great resort of the better classes from the inland towns in the summer months, when the influx of visitors often exceeds 20,000. Mean temp., yr. 60.1° F., Jan. 45.3°, Aug. 76.1°; mean rfall. (1857–91), yr. 33.8 in., Oct.–Nov. 10.3 in. P. (1881) 97,600. [E. A.]

Leicester (lĕs'ter), Saxon Legeoceaster, not improbably the Ratæ or Ragæ of the Romans, old mun. bor. (since John's reign), parl. and co. bor., and market and co. tn., Eng., Leicestershire, diocese of Peterborough, 97½ m. by rail from London, 27 m. by rail, 22 m. direct S., Nottingham, on the L. & NW. R., M. R., and G. N. R., and on the riv. Soar, which is navigable to this point, beyond which navigation is continued by the L. and Northamptonshire Union, the Grand Union, and Grand Junction Canals to the Thames. The staple trade of the town is in woollen hosiery, for which it has been noted at least since the middle of the 18th century (the breed of sheep in the county of L. yielding one of the finest wools for the manufacture of worsted yarn). Next in importance to hosiery is the boot and shoe manufacture. Sewing-cotton, lace, and elastic webbing are also made, and there are large mills for the doubling and spinning of lambs' wool. A neighbouring coal-field affords abundant supply of cheap coal. The church of St. Nicholas is built partly of bricks from the old Roman wall. In 1852 the main drainage was commenced and completed in 1854; further works on a great scale, begun by the Corporation in 1884, in order to obviate the risk of occasional basement flooding, and to dispose of the town sewage, which is utilised on a sewage-farm of 1375 ac. L. was a British city, cap. of the Coritani, and from 680–874 the seat of a bishopric. Formerly seat of an abbey in which Cardinal Wolsey died (1530). Market-days, W. and S. Mun. bor. P. [1] The administrative county includes also the parts of Market Harborough and Great and Little Bowden, urban sanitary dist., in the ancient county of Northampton, and the part of Hinckley dist. in that of Warwick. Area, 528,986 ac. P. 375,092.

Surface undulating, mainly below 500 ft., but rising in the NW. in Charnwood Forest to 912 ft. Elsewhere also hilly country prevails, the Soar and its trib., the Wreak, traversing well-marked valleys. Geologically, the E. half of the county belongs to the Lias, the W. mainly to the New Red Sandstone; but in Charnwood Forest, besides Archæan and igneous rocks, there is a considerable area of Cambrian age, and in the extreme W. of the county there is a small but productive coalfield, coal being mined at Asbby-de-la-Zouch, Whitwick, Bagworth, Moira, Woodville, Ibstock, Heather, Netherseal, and Coalville. Among other minerals of importance are iron ore at Melton Mowbray, fireclay at Burton-on-Trent and Ashby Wolds, pipeclay at Woodville and Overseal. Limestone is quarried at Barrow-on-Soar, and Breedon (for lime), and slate at Swithland and Groby; granite and syenite at Mountsorrel, Groby, Enderby, and Croft. The county is noted for its breed of horses, cattle, and sheep, and for its dairy produce, notably Stilton cheese. The famous L. breed of sheep, which yields one of the finest of 'long-stapled' wools (adapted for the spinning of worsted yarn for use in the hosiery manufacture), was perfected about the middle of the 18th century by Bakewell, a noted agriculturist of this county. From the tables in the Appendix, pp. 7–9, it may be seen that L. is at the head of all English counties in the relative extent of permanent pasture and number of cattle relatively to total area, and that it is one of those showing the greatest increase under both these heads in 1893 as compared with 1869, while the county shows the same diminution as others in the area under corn and green crops. The principal manufacture is worsted and cotton hose; there are also agricultural implement and pottery and fire-brick factories. At Melton Mowbray there are blast-furnaces. The railways are numerous, belonging mainly to the Midland system, but also to the G. N. R., and in the S. to the L. & NW. R. Canals from the collieries in the NW., and the Soar near Leicester, connect with the Grand Junction Canal and the Thames. The first known inhabitants of this dist. were the Coritani Welsh, whom the Romans subdued. The terr. was later taken by the English and Warings, named the Middle English, and shared the fate of the kingdom of Mercia. The northmen settled here, and it was within the Dane-laga, but after the accession of William the Conqueror it ranked with the other shires. See England, table.

Leipzig (name derived from Slav. lipa or lip=lime tree), second tn. of the kgd. of Saxony. It is situated in a large and fertile plain, in 51° 20′ 6″ N. lat. and 12° 23′ 30″ E. long., at the confluence of the Elster, Pleisse, and Parthe. L. is an interesting town, and has many old buildings and narrow streets in the centre; these are surrounded by the modern parts of the town, which are finely built, and intersected by broad avenues and promenades. Celebrated are the Pleissenburg (the old citadel of L. during the Middle Ages), the Guild Hall, the Royal Palace, and among the churches New St. Peter's, beautifully built in the Gothic style. A number of suburbs which surround L., viz., Plagwitz, Lindenau, Reudnitz, Connewitz, and Gohlis, are connected with the industrial development of the town. L. is one of the principal industrial and commercial cities of the German Empire. It is the centre of the German book trade: there are a great many printing and bookbinding establishments, and more than 500 publishing firms have their seat at L. Also other industries have greatly developed in recent times, the textile, iron, leather, paper, and tobacco industries being in a flourishing state. The great commercial importance of L. is due to its situation in the plain between the industrial dists. of the Erzgebirge and the Thuringian Forest Mts., and on the natural highway connecting the Rhine with the Elbe terrs. Railways converge from all directions, and the three great fairs, which are annually held, are still among the principal commercial features of L., although they have ceased to be of such world-wide importance as was the case in the 17th and 18th centuries. Since 1879 L. is the seat of the 'Reichsgericht,' the supreme court of justice of the German Empire. The university of L., founded in 1409, is one of the principal centres of learning on the continent, and is frequented by more than 3000 students. In the early Middle Ages L. was a village of Wendish fishermen. It is first mentioned as a town in 1015. In the following centuries it made rapid strides, but suffered greatly during the Thirty Years' and Seven Years' Wars. The Napoleonic campaigns also proved a very critical period for the town, until the French were finally driven out of Germany after their crushing defeat in the great battle of Leipzig (16th to 19th October 1813). Since that time the industrial and commercial development of L. has been great and rapid. Alt. 390 ft. Mean temp., yr. 46.7° F., Jan. 30.6°, July 65°; mean rfall. (20 years), 22.7 in. P. Leith (lith), ancient Let or Inverlet, parl. burgh (since 1833), mun. burgh, par., seapt., and tn., Scot., Midlothian, on S. shore of the Firth of Forth, its S. boundary conterminous with the N. boundary of Edinburgh, with stns. on the C. R. and N. B. R. Besides important shipbuilding yards, the town has saw, flour, and meal mills, sugar refineries, engineering works, breweries, and distilleries. Its formerly important manufacture of glass has all but died out. The first wooden pier was made (by the Earl of Hertford) in 1544, followed early in the 17th century by another. The first wet dock was begun in 1800, and finished in 1806. L. has now 6 dry docks, the largest 385 ft. long, 21 ft. deep on sill at high water ordinary spring tides, an inner and outer harbour (the latter with 3000 ft. of quayage; depth at side ordinary springs, high water, 26½ ft., low water, 9 ft.), and 6 wet docks, the largest being the Edinburgh Dock, area 16⅔ ac., depth over sill, high water, 25½ ft. ordinary springs, 22 ft. ordinary neaps. Total water area of harbours and docks, 80 ac. The continental trade of L. is chiefly with Hamburg, Christiansand, Copenhagen, Stettin, Bremerhaven, Amsterdam, Antwerp, Dunkirk, and Rotterdam. For statistics, see Appendix, p. 13. There is a Government Navigation School. The town was walled and fortified in 1549 by D'Essé, commander of the French troops in Scotland. The stone wall, pierced by six gates or 'ports,' was partly dismantled in 1560, rebuilt in 1571, and has now totally disappeared. The citadel of L., constructed mainly by the forces of Oliver Cromwell in 1650, was of considerable size, and stood on the North L. side of the river. After the Restoration it was almost entirely destroyed, and now only a Saxon archway and a few feet of old wall remain. L. was the birthplace of John Home, the author of 'Douglas.' L. unites with Musselburgh and Portobello in returning a member to Parliament. Mean temp. (20 yrs.), yr. 47.8° F., Jan. 39.1°, July 59.0°; rfall. (25 yrs.), 23.6 in. Tn. P. Leitrim (lī'trĭm), co., Ire., Connaught, bounded W. by cos. Roscommon and Sligo, N. by the bay and co. Donegal, E. by cos. Fermanagh and Cavan, and SE. by co. Longford; divided into the following baronies:—

Baronies.	Acres.	Pop. 1891.
Carrigallen	62,597	14,691
Drumahaire	110,151	20,798
Leitrim	59,243	14,270
Mohill	62,903	15,899
Rosclogher	81,616	12,960
Total, Leitrim . . .	376,510	78,618

The surface is mostly wild and rugged; in the S. of the county below 500 ft., in the N. mountainous. Slieve Anierin, E. of Lough Allen, in the centre of the county, reaches a height of 1922 ft. Loughs Allen and Melvin are mainly in this county, and there are numerous smaller lakes. The chief river is the Shannon, which enters the county about the middle, flows S. into Lough Allen, which it drains S., forming part of the western boundary of the county. The Erne and Shannon Junction Canal traverses the county through the middle of its lower portion. More than half of the area is pasture land. For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 10–12. The county belongs almost entirely to the Carboniferous era, but mainly to the unproductive members of the series, although there are one or two patches belonging to the coal-measures, and coal, mined at Knockateeane, Seltannaskeagh, and Tullymorrow, is the only mineral of importance. There are manufactures of linens and coarse woollens. The Longford and Sligo Rly. passes through the extreme SW., and its branch, the Sligo, Leitrim and Northern Cos. Rly., the N. of the county. Two members (N. and S. divs.) are returned to Parliament. County town, Carrick-on-Shannon; other towns with more than 1000 inhabitants, Manorhamilton and Mohill. See Ireland, table.

Lena, riv., E. Siberia, govts. Irkutsk and Yakutsk, one of the largest on the earth, rises on NW. slope of Baikal Mts., describes first a large arc towards the S., then turns N., and from the mouth of the Kuta assumes a NE. direction, which it maintains till Yakutsk, only making one big bending between the mouths of the Vitim and the Olekma; from Yakutsk flows NNW. and N. till its entrance into the Arctic Ocean, where it makes a large delta. Only the first 100 m. of its course in the mountains are not navigable; but from Kachug (alt. about 1500 ft.), and especially from Verkholensk, it becomes a large river, regularly navigated. On the next 1200 m. of its course, till Olekminsk (60° 22′ N.), it flows in a valley deeply cut into the surrounding high plains, and its shores are high cliffs of sandstones, limestones, and conglomerates, only small poor villages appearing in the narrow lateral valleys. After receiving the Vitim it attains a width of 700 yards, which is doubled below Olekminsk, where many islands appear in the river bed, while the L. flows amidst low plains another 400 m. to Yakutsk. Here begins its lower course, 1200 m., the L. attaining, with its branches, a width of from 5 to 17 m., and a depth of from 8 to 10 fathoms. The delta of the L., which occupies about 270 m. of the coast of the Arctic Ocean, is a labyrinth of islands (Borokhaya and Khangalatskiy being the largest), the chief branches of the L. being at their mouths 5 to 7 m. wide. Sagastyr (73° 35′ N., 117° 20′ E.) is the most northern inhabited spot of the delta, and has been for two years the seat of a Polar meteorological station. The L. is free from ice by the end of April at Kachug, in the first days of June at Yakutsk, and only in July in its delta, which occasionally remains inaccessible throughout the summer on account of ice. Freezes by the end of October at Kachug (162 days free from ice at Kirensk), and in first days of October at Yakutsk. Important artery for the transport of provisions and goods to the gold-washings of the Vitim and Olekma region, as well as for food supplies to Yakutsk. Steamers now ply also up the Vitim. Receives over 300 large tribs., of which several are themselves large rivers; (r. bk.) Kirenga, Chuya, Vitim (1100 m.), Olekma (702 m.), Aldan (1160 m.); (l. bk.) Ilga, Kuta, Nyuya, Vilyui (1313 m.) and Muna. Length, 2860 m.; area of basin, 908,980 sq. m.

Leominster (the Lemster of Camden, and still so pronounced), mun. bor. (since the time of Queen Mary), also a parl. bor. till 1885, Eng., co., diocese, and 12 m. N. by W. Hereford, L. div., on the Lugg and the G. W. and L. & NW. Rlys. Great trade in hops, cider, and Hereford cattle; there are also wool-stapling establishments, and woollen cloths were formerly made to some extent. In the beginning of the 17th century the dist. was noted for its wool, which, according to Camden, was spoken of as 'Lemster ore.' The parish church of SS. Peter and Paul is an ancient edifice. Some remains exist of a priory (dissolved in 1539), and its mill may yet be seen. The old town hall or butter cross (erected by John Abel in 1633), a fine specimen of Elizabethan timber work, was taken down in 1855 to make way for a new town-hall, but was purchased by a private gentleman, and has been re-erected in the neighbourhood as a dwelling-house. Leon, manufacturing tn., Mexico, state of and 31 m. W. by N. Guanajuato. Alt. 5900 ft. Rfall. (9 yrs.), 28.44 in. P. (estimated at) 50,000.

Leon, an old kgd., afterwards a prov., in the NW. of Spain, now divided into the three provs. of Leon (N.), Zamora (middle), and Salamanca (S.), along with which Palencia and Valladolid (now in Old Castille) were formerly included. It stretches from the Asturian or Cantabrian Mts. on the N. to the Sierra de Gata in the S., and borders W. on Portugal and Galicia. It belongs mainly to the basin of the Douro (Duero), which traverses it in the middle from E. to W., and here receives the Esla (r. bk.), and Tormes (l. bk), and other tribs.; but the NW. belongs to the basin of the Minho, being traversed by the upper Sil, which here flows through the well-wooded and beautiful valley known as El Vierzo; and the SE. belongs to that of the Tagus, the wild valley of Batuecas, E. of the Sierra de Peña de Francia (a continuation of the Sierra de Gata, running NE. into the present prov. of Salamanca), forming the upper part of the basin of the Alagon. L. belongs, as a whole, to the tableland of Spain, the mean elevation being above 2500 ft. The N. and S. parts are the most mountainous; mountains covering, on the N. and W., about half of the present prov. of L., while the most considerable plains belong to the remainder of that prov. The two provs. to the S. are too deeply cut by the numerous river valleys, and traversed by too many hill ranges, to leave room for plains properly so called. The surface is not very productive. The W. of prov. Zamora is particularly barren. Only a very limited extent is irrigated. The chief crops are grain (above all, wheat) and pulses, as in other parts of the tableland of Spain. Large tracts, especially in the more level areas, are occupied only by sheep-pastures, which form the summer grazing-grounds of large flocks of merino-sheep. Minerals are of little importance, the mines being mostly little worked, or not at all. Some mines of iron are worked in the mountains of prov. L., antimony and silver-lead are mined near Alcañices (near Portuguese frontier, N. of the Douro), tin in Sayago (near frontier S. of the Douro), and copper and iron in the dist. of Zamora. See Spain, table and historical notes.

Léon, city, Spain, 55 m. SSE. Oviedo, cap. of prov. L., and formerly of the kingdom of L. Seat of a bishop; its cathedral, founded in the 10th century, but dating mainly from the 14th century, is one of the finest specimens of old Gothic architecture. It contains the tombs of many of the kings of L. The city has also a fine Gothic town-house, and many old palaces of Spanish grandees. L. was only for a short time in the hands of the Arabs, having been wrested from them by Pelayo (Pelagius) in 722. L. is of Roman origin, and owes its name to its having been the seat of the 7th legion. P. 13,400.

Leukas (lefkas), Leucadia, or Santa Maura, one of the Ionian Is., Greece, 46 m. SE. and part of prov. Corfu, of which it forms an eparchy, separated from the W. coast of Acarnania, with which it is said to have been once connected, by a channel, 1 m. across, and at present too shallow for any but small vessels. A chain of limestone mountains intersects it from N. to S., covering the surface with its spurs, and terminating SW. in the promontory of Leukatas, or Dukaton, the ancient Leucadia, famous as 'Sappho's leap,' and from the white cliffs of which the island derived its name. Mount Stavrotas, or Nomali, in the centre, is 3745 ft. in height. Climate very variable, the temperature often rising or falling 20° F. in a day; the low grounds, especially at the N. extremity, are unhealthy. The N. region is rugged and wild, but towards the S. and E. are some fine valleys, where the olive and vine are cultivated. Many of the population live by fishing, the manufacture of salt, and annual emigrations to the mainland as labourers in the harvest time. The castle of Santa Maura is at its N. extremity, on a spit of land to the S. of which is the town of Leukas, cap. of the island, formerly called Hamaxikion. Lewes (lu'es), old mun. bor., but not formally incorporated till 1881 (till 1885 also a parl. bor.), Eng., cap. co. Sussex, Mid or L. div., on the navigable riv. Ouse (about 7 m. from its mouth), 7½ m. ENE. Brighton, in the diocese of Chichester, on the L. B. & S. C. R. L. stands on a small hill surrounded by higher hills, and is an important agricultural centre, holding large annual sheep and lamb fairs. Here, on the 14th of May 1264, Simon de Montfort and the barons defeated Henry III., and imprisoned him in the castle, a Saxon erection, which William de Warrene, son-in-law of William I., rebuilt, enlarged, or strengthened. Some of the rooms of this castle are now used as the museum of the Sussex Archæological Society, and the remains include the gateway, a good and well preserved specimen of the architecture of the reign of Edward III. The ruins of a Cluniac priory (founded by the same William de Warrene in 1078) are extensive and picturesque. The free grammar school was founded and endowed in 1512. Mean rfall. Lewis with Harris, the northernmost and largest island of the Outer Hebrides, off the W. ct. of Scot., between 57° 40′ and 58° 32′ N., 6° and 7° W., separated from the mainland by the Minch, a sea 30 m. across. Length, N. to S., 60 m.; greatest breadth, 30 m.; area about 770 sq. m., of which L., the N. portion, separated from Harris by the inlets Lochs Reasort and Seaforth, comprises about 575 sq. m. Coast line very much indented; on the E. side are Loch Erisort and Broad Bay, and on the W. Loch Roag. Its N. headland, the Butt of Lewis, in 58° 31′ N., 6° 14′ W., rises to 80 ft. above the sea. Mealasval in the W., and Ben More in the E., of the broadest part of the island both reach 1750 ft. in height, and a great part of the island is rugged; but it is not generally so lofty and bare as Harris, and it has many low, swampy tracts. Gneiss is the prevailing rock, and much of the surface is covered with peat, and with remains of ancient forests. Chief crops, barley and potatoes; chief industries, cattle-breeding, fishing, kelp-making, and domestic manufactures. Extensive improvements in draining, road-making, and building schools have been effected by Sir James Matheson, who acquired the Seaforth estates in 1844. The island abounds with Druidic edifices [Callernish] and ruined fortresses. The people are almost entirely of Celtic descent, but in the N. (Butt of L.) are a race of purely Scandinavian origin, although speaking the Gaelic language. L. is divided into the four pars.—Stornoway, Uig, Barvas, and Lochs. Stornoway, the only town, is on the E. coast. P. (1871) 25,947; (1891) 30,726.

Lhasa, Lhassa, Lassa, or Hlassa ('land of God,' from lha, 'God,' and sa, 'land'), the cap. city of Tibet, and residence of the Grand Lama, on the Kichu Sanpo, a l. bk. affluent of the Brahmaputra, in 29° 39′ N., 91° 5′ E. (Pandit Nain Sing). The city is circular, 2½ m. in circumference, and occupies an open level plain surrounded by mountains. It has numerous towers, bazaars, and temples. The city is remarkable for the number and size of its monasteries, which are greatly resorted to by the Chinese and Mongols as schools of the Buddhist religion and philosophy. It is the 'Rome' of Buddhism. The Sara monastery, in which 5500 priests are said to minister, is about 3 m. distant from the city, at the foot of a mountain covered with temples having gilded spires, which contain numerous idols richly decked with gold, silver, and precious stones. On the opposite or l. bk. of the Kichu is the Goldau monastery, three-quarters of a mile in circumference, and with 3300 priests. In the centre of the city itself there is a large temple. About 4 m. W. of the city is the Debang monastery, with 7700 priests. The Ramoche monastery is on the N. side of the city. About 2 m. from the latter is a large fort, named Potolah, which is the residence of the great Lama, who is the reputed chief of all Tibet. The first European traveller who visited L. was the monk Odorico di Pordenone, early in the 14th century; the next, the Jesuit Antonio d'Andrada in 1624. In the middle of the 18th century there was a small settlement of Capuchin monks at L., but since they were expelled in 1760, only three Europeans have succeeded in reaching the city, namely, Manning, the Cambridge mathematician and friend of Lamb, who was there in 1811–12, and the French missionaries Huc and Gabet in 1846. Good crops of barley, wheat, peas, mustard, and a variety of vegetables are produced. There is a considerable general trade. A great market is held in December, when merchants from all the neighbouring countries are assembled here; the principal goods for sale are silk, carpets, and porcelain from China; gold lace, gums, and superior carpets from Tartary; tea, musk, riee, and tobacco from Sikkim. Silver ores and gold occur in abundance in the surrounding hills, but the government refuses to work them or to allow them to be worked. The lapidaries, workers in metal, and engravers at L. have a high reputation for skill. Alt. 11,910 ft. P. 25,000.

Liberia, Negro Republic, on the Pepper Coast in W. Africa, extending S. of Sierra Leone from the Manna R. to the Kavalli R. (E. of Cape Palmas). The boundaries in the interior have not yet been accurately determined. L. comprises the terrs. of Mesurado, Bassa, Sinu, Maryland, Gola, Kondo, Barline, and Busie. The coast is flat and swampy, but in the interior the country gradually rises, and is covered with beautiful forests. Numerous rivers flow to the Atlantic, the principal being the St. Paul's, Dukwea, St. John's, Sestos, and Sinu. The soil of L. is very fertile; the coffee plant grows in many parts of the country, and Liberian coffee, which is renowned for its excellent quality, is exported in large quantities. Other exports are palm-oil, palm-nut kernels, kola-nuts, sugar, arrow-root, ivory, caoutchouc, timber, dye-woods, hides, and gold. The climate, although somewhat better than the more eastern terrs. of Upper Guinea, is nevertheless dangerous to Europeans; and with the exception of a number of American, English, German, and Dutch factories, there are no settlements of whites in the country. Only a small portion of the Negro population can be called civilised. The constitution of L. is on the model of that of the U.S. No white man can become a citizen of L. The cap. is Monrovia (P. about 5000); other towns are Robertsport, Edina, Grand-Bassa, Sinu, and Harper. The origin of this native republic dates back to 1822, when a number of American philanthropists bought a tract of land near Cape Mesurado as a settlement for free Negroes. The colony steadily grew, and was declared an independent republic in 1847. But this experiment of Negro self-government has proved a failure, as L. is at the present day in a state of political and financial incapacity. Area estimated at 14,000 sq. m. P. at 1,000,000. [H. Lichfield (called by Bede Lycetfeld, which is traditionally interpreted as 'field of carcases,' and believed to refer to a great massacre of Christians under Diocletian in a place still called Christians' Field), city, mun. bor. (since the reign of Edward VI., till 1885 also a parl. bor.), market-tn., and co. of itself, Eng., co. and 15 m. SE. by E. Stafford, L. div., about 1 m. N. of the Birmingham Canal, with two stns. (Lichfield, city, and Lichfield, Trent Valley, 16 m. from Birmingham) on different lines of the L. & NW. R. The cathedral, commenced by Roger de Clinton in 1128, dedicated to St. Mary and St. Ceadd (Chad), and completed in the 15th century, is richly decorated, and rendered conspicuous by three spires. Its length is 403 ft. from E. to W., and it has three towers with spires, of which the central is 252 ft. in height. The cathedral library contains the Saxon Gospels of St. Chad, and other literary rarities. It has a museum and free library, attached to which is a public recreation ground of 5½ ac., and a free grammar school, in which Addison, Johnson, and Garrick were educated. Johnson's birthplace and monument are in St. Mary's Square. L. is abundantly supplied with water from springs near the city; has several breweries, and manufactures of carriages, harness, &c. The neighbourhood has extensive market gardens. The bishopric, founded by the early Saxons in the 7th century, comprises nearly the entire county of Stafford, a large part of Salop, and small portions of the counties of Warwick, Derby, Chester, and Flint. Cheese fairs are held on January 12th, February 14th, May 12th, and November 2nd. Market-day, F. P. (1851) 7000; (1871) 7350; (1891) 7900; parl. div. P. (1891) 52,000.

Lille (Flemish Ryssel, ancient L'Isle, named from an insulated castle), tn., France, cap. dep. Nord, cap. arr. L., 42 m. SE. Dunkirk, in a large plain watered by different canalised arms of the Deule. Fortified place of the first class, surrounded by fortified walls, and commanded on its NW. side by a citadel, constructed by Vauban at the beginning of the 18th century. One of the principal industrial towns of France; chief manufactures, flax and hemp yarn; to a smaller extent, linen thread, cloths, table linen, cotton goods, tulle, chemicals; with dyeworks, sugar-works, distilleries, and factories of machines and engine boilers. Its vicinity is studded with bleaching-grounds, rape seed oil-mills, and beet-root plantations, the latter of which are very important. The public library has 75,000 vols. The original nucleus of the town, between two arms of the Deule, was the castle of l'Ile, founded by the counts of Flanders; taken by the French from Austria in 1667, and by siege by the allies under the Duke of Marlborough in 1708, and unsuccessfully bombarded by the Austrians in 1792. Rfall. 22.44 in. P. (1872) 152,800; (1891) 201,200.

Lima (said to be a corruption of Rimac), cap. city of Peru and dep. L., on the Rimac, in a valley about 6 m. from its port, Callao, on the Pacific, and connected with it by a railway, in 12° 3′ S., 77° 5′ 30″ W. It is about 2 m. in length by 1¼ m. in greatest breadth, and separated from a suburb by the Rimac, and elsewhere enclosed by a bastioned wall, entered by six gates. It is of Spanish origin, founded by Francisco Pizarro, January 18, 1535, under the name of Ciudad de los Reyes ('city of the kings'), ancient capital of the viceroyalty of Peru, and is the most handsome city in S. America; its numerous domes and spires give it a magnificent appearance. Principal edifices, the cathedral church, archbishop's palace (now partly occupied by the Peruvian senate), the former residence of the viceroy (now the court-house), a university, a public library with rare books, including several dating from the 15th century, a public museum; and outside of the walls, a planted promenade, a public cemetery, and public baths. It has manufactures of gold lace, and a glass factory. Its vicinity is fertile, and produces large quantities of provisions and live stock. Climate pleasant, but not healthy. There are abundant dews and fogs, especially in winter, but no rain; but the mortality is high, partly owing perhaps to great neglect of drainage and disposal of refuse, yellow fever and small-pox appearing every five or seven years. It was long the grand commercial entrepôt for all the W. coast of S. America, and it still has a large trade, its exports consisting of silver, copper ore, bark, soap, vicuna wool, chinchilla skins, nitre, sugar, &c.; and imports of manufactured goods, wines, silks, and brandy. For its railway connections, see Peru. Alt. 565 ft. Mean temp. (2 yrs.), yr. 73.3° F., Feb. 79.9°, Aug. 67.3°. P. (1793) 53,000; (1871) 160,100; (1891) 103,600.

[1] Exclusive of 17,869 ac. under the larger rivers, lakes, and tideways.

The surface on the E., S., and W. border mountainous or hilly, with a soil generally moorish or boggy. In the centre and N. mostly flat, and soil remarkably fertile, especially on the Shannon and in the 'Golden Vale,' or E. part of the plain of L. Climate mild, but humid. Principal rivers, the Shannon, Mulkear, Maigue, and Deel. Dairy and stock-farms numerous, and many of them extensive. The county belongs mainly to the Carboniferous system, including in the SW. a small area of the coal-measures, but without any coal-mines; and there are no minerals, apart from stone, of great economic importance in the county. The inhabitants are mainly engaged in agriculture. For statistics, see Appendix, pp. 9–11. Manufactures coarse woollens, paper, flour and meal. Among the inhabitants are a number of so-called Palatines, descendants of German Protestants, planted in various parts of the county in the early part of the 18th century. The county returns two members to Parliament (divs. E. and W.), besides one for L. City.

Limerick (Irish Luimneach, pronounced liminegh, 'waste piece of land'), parl. bor. (one member, two members until 1885), mun. bor., and civic tn., Ire., N. co. L., bar. Clanwilliam, 12½ m. SW. by S. Killaloe, on the l. bk. of the Shannon, with stns. on the Waterford & Limerick and the G. S. & W. Rlys. Seat of an Anglican bishop, whose diocese now includes the former diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and of a Roman Catholic bishop. Originally the city stood on King's I., but now stretches along both sides of the Shannon, which is here crossed by five bridges. The flour-milling and bacon trades are very extensive, and there are also tanneries, foundries, flour and saw mills, patent slip for vessels of 500 tons, a floating-dock where vessels of 3000 tons can discharge, and a graving-dock admitting vessels of 2500 tons. The harbour has an area of 7½ ac., with 2930 ft. of quayage, and a depth over sill at highest spring tides of 22 ft. 10 in., at lowest neap of 17 ft. 9 in. Market-days, W. and S. Parl. bor. P. (1 member), mun. bor. (since Edward II.), co. bor., market-tn., and seat of a bishop, Eng., cap. co. L., on the Witham, which here becomes navigable, 14 m. SE. by S. Gainsborough, 132 m. from King's Cross, London. It stands at the foot and on the slope of a hill and on the tableland stretching N., the hill being crowned by its cathedral, castle, &c. The Witham here passes through a breach in the High Dyke, which has long been the place of convergence of numerous roads, as it is now of railways, six lines meeting in the city, which is also connected by the Foss Dyke and the Trent with Nottingham, Gainsborough and the Humber, and by the Witham navigation with Boston, &c. L. has extensive agricultural implement and engineering iron-works, steam flour mills, and does considerable trade in corn and wool. There are large and important fat stock markets every Tuesday, and a great fair (for horses, sheep, and cattle) is held in the last whole week in April. On July 5th is the midsummer fair for horses, cattle, pigs, &c. Large public commons are used as recreation grounds. The diocese was founded in 636 at Dorchester (Oxfordshire), but finally established at L. in 1088. The foundations of the cathedral were laid by St. Remigius, the first bishop; but this building was burnt down early in the 12th century, and the present edifice was erected between the 12th and 15th centuries in a mixed style of English architecture, the exterior being considered very fine, while the interior is surpassed only by that of York. It has latterly undergone restoration. Its famous bell, 'Great Tom of L.,' is the third of that name, and weighs 5 tons 8 cwt. Several of the parish churches are interesting, and the city abounds in ancient remains. Other principal buildings are the county hall (within the castle walls); the ancient guild hall (or Stonebors), grammar school, county hospital, school of art and science, diocesan training school, &c. Portions of the Roman wall, including Newport Gate, leading to the N. part of the city, still survive, and many fragments of masonry, tesselated pavements, altars, sepulchral monuments, &c., have been discovered. L. was at the Conquest, and long after, one of the richest ports of England, the Witham at that period being navigable for large vessels. It suffered greatly during the baronial wars, and also in the civil war, when its cathedral was occupied as a barrack. The diocese includes almost the whole county and a few acres of Norfolk and the W. Riding of Yorkshire. L. races in spring and autumn are reckoned to begin and end the flat racing season in England. Market-days, F. and S. Mean rfall. (1866–1880), 23.8 in. P. (1851) 17,500; (1871) 26,800; (1891) 41,500; parl. bor. P. 44,000.

[1] Includes part of Stamford in the ancient county of Northampton.
[2] Includes part of Crowle urban sanitary dist. in the ancient W. Riding of Yorkshire.

The county extends between the North Sea and the riv. Trent, and includes in the NW. the Isle of Axholme beyond the Trent. Geologically, the N. half of the county has members of all the systems from the New Red Sandstone to the Upper Cretaceous; the last being succeeded on the coast by a band of alluvium. First there is a narrow strip of New Red Sandstone bordering the Trent, next another narrow strip of Lias widening out towards the S. of the county, then a broader tract of Oolites, and then a considerable track of Chalk, bordered on the W. and S. by Lower Cretaceous rocks (Upper and Lower Greensand). The Chalk region (the L. Wolds), along with a meridional ridge in the W., known as the High Dyke, on the borders of the Lias and Oolites, form the only elevations in the county, the SE. of which, on the borders of the Wash, is wholly occupied by alluvial lowlands belonging to the Bedford Level. In this region are extensive fens (the Holland and others to the W. of the Witham below the city of L., the E. and W. Fen between the Witham and the sea, the Bourn and Deeping Fens, &c., on different sides of the Welland, in the extreme S. of the county). As late as the end of last century the E. Fen was largely occupied by lakes. Though all the fens are now drained, they are still very sparsely peopled. The whole of the coast is low and bordered by shallow seas, and is without good natural harbours, though an important seaport has been created artificially at Grimsby. The three administrative counties named above in the second table correspond to old divs. of the county; of these the Parts of Lindsey comprise the N. half, and contain the wolds and chalk hills, the Parts of Kesteven are in the SW., and the Parts of Holland include most of the fens in the SE. Climate in the fens moist, and previous to the extensive drainage now effected, very productive of ague. Soil, mostly a fertile sandy loam on the moors and wolds; in the fens, deep loam, rich marly clay, or peat. Improvements in agriculture, especially as regards draining, irrigation, and bone manuring, have rendered this one of the most productive English counties. The soil of the fens is unsurpassed elsewhere in quality. The cattle, mostly short-horned, are of excellent breed, and attain a great weight. The sheep are also famous for size and long wool. Many horses are bred and sold for hunters and superior carriage horses at the L. and Horncastle horse fairs. The English black horse used by London brewers is largely reared in the fens. For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 7–9. The waste fens once supported vast flocks of geese, chiefly kept for their feathers, and the waters are the resort of wild ducks. Estates and farms of all sizes. The most important mineral product is iron ore, a brown hematite, yielding about one-third of iron, which is largely produced, chiefly from open-works, in the Lias near Grantham in the S. of the county, and Frodingham and Scunthorpe in the N., and is smelted at the two last-mentioned places. The sea-fishing industry has been largely developed of late years, and Grimsby is now the largest fishing port in the kingdom. Boston is also increasing in importance in this respect. The county is mainly traversed by various lines of the G. N. R., including the G. N. and G. E. joint line. In the N. it is crossed by the M. S. & L. R., which has its terminus at Grimsby. A branch line of the Midland enters it on the W., and the Lancashire, Derbyshire, and East Coast line (now in construction) is to cross the county and have a terminus at Sutton, where it is proposed to form another large seaport. L. is in the Midland circuit and diocese of L., and contains four parl. bors., L., Grantham, Boston, and Grimsby, all of which, along with Louth and Stamford, are also mun. bors. This county is famous for the number and beauty of its ancient parish churches. Anciently it was inhabited by the Coritani, believed to have been a branch of the Iceni. Afterwards it was at one time part of Northumbria (and then known as Southumberland), and later belonged to Mercia. See England, table.

Linlith'gow, royal and parl. burgh (see Falkirk), tn., and par., Scot., cap. co. L., on the Union Canal, and the N. B. R., 16½ m. W. Edinburgh. It is situated in a hollow, beside a fine lake of 102 ac. On an eminence, bordered by the lake, are remains of a royal palace on the site of a Roman camp, founded in 15th century, and gradually rebuilt in its present form by various Scottish monarchs down to James VI. It is a quadrangle, occupying an acre of ground; has a heavy but imposing exterior, and fine apartments, the most interesting being the parliament hall, and the room in which Mary Queen of Scots was born in 1542. The town has a grammar school, a branch bank, manufactures of leather, paper, and shoes; coal-mining carried on. Here the Regent Moray was assassinated by Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh. Market-day, F. Burgh P. (1891) <4500; tn. P. <4500; par. 11,450 ac., P. 7700.

Linlithgow Bridge, vil., Scot., Linlithgowshire and Stirlingshire, on riv. Avon, 1 m. W. Linlithgow, P.O. P. <750.

Linlithgowshire, or West Lothian, co., Scot., having N. the Firth of Forth, E. and S. co. Edinburgh, and W. the cos. Lanark and Stirling. Surface beautifully varied with knolls and gentle undulations. Chief rivers the Almond and Avon. Soil in the S. swampy and moorland, elsewhere fertile. Agriculture similar to that of the other Lothians, except that more turnips are raised. For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 10–12. Geologically, the county belongs mainly to the Lower Carboniferous (Calciferous sandstone and Carboniferous limestone series), but with numerous patches of Igneous rock of the same age, and in the S. a considerable area of coal-measures. Coal is largely mined in this part of the county near Bathgate, and at Armadale, Whitburn, and Fauldhouse, and at Armadale and Fauldhouse iron ore is also produced. An even more important mineral product is oil-shale (for the production of paraffin and paraffin oil), at several places in the E. of the county (at or near Broxburn, Winchburgh, Uphall, Kirkliston, as well as in the neighbourhood of West Calder, which is in Midlothian). Binny quarry, whence the freestone used in public buildings in Edinburgh is procured, is in the county, near Uphall. Chief towns, Linlithgow (the cap.), Broxburn, Borrowstouness (Bo'ness), Bathgate, Armadale, Fauldhouse, and S. Queensferry, close to which is the Forth Bridge (q.v.). Area, 76,807 ac. P. (1891) 52,808. See Scotland, table.

Lisbon ('Lisboa,' Phœnician Alis ubbo, 'delicious bay,' mythically corrupted into Olysippo, Ulyssippo, 'the town of Ulysses'; ancient Roman Felicitas Julia; Arab Ochbuna and Lachbuna), the cap. of Portugal, built on many hills (some of them 300 ft. high) along the N. banks of riv. Tagus (10 m. from the sea) for about 8 m. L. was conquered by the Moors in the 12th century, and almost entirely destroyed (1755) by the most celebrated of all earthquakes. The old parts (Alfama, Mouraria) are around the castle (São Jorge) and the cathedral (Sé). The new quarters stretch W. and N. (Baixa, Alcantara, Buenos Aires, Avenida da Liberdade, Estephania). Many independent villages (Belem, Bemfica, Lumiar, Olivaes) are now included in L. town. L. has polytechnic, agricultural, industrial, medical, engineering, mining, military, and naval colleges; an academy of fine art, a Conservatorio of music, and a faculty of letters; an astronomical observatory (38° 42′ 31.3″ N., 9° 11′ 10″ W.); chemical laboratories, a museum of Natural History (important African collections), Ethnological Museum (African and Indian), National Museum of Art (Flemish-Portuguese paintings of the 15th century; gold and silver Portuguese works of the 15th and 16th centuries), a public library (200,000 vols., 10,000 MSS.), some manufactures. Residence of the king; seat of Parliament; an archbishop with the title of Patriarch. The port of Lisbon is one of the best in the world; well protected, although sometimes exposed to stormy SW. winds. At the entrance the N. pass is 36–40 ft.; the S. 88–102 ft. (1 m. wide), then 40–164 ft. deep to some distance E. of Lisbon, at first forming a channel (1½–3 m. wide), then a large basin 7 m. wide (25.210 hectomètres). Spacious docks are in course of construction. Lisbon is in a very favourable commercial position in relation to South America, West and South Africa, with which two continents (as well as with the Atlantic islands and all European ports) it is in regular steam communication. Lisbon became cap. of Portugal in the 15th century, and from the discovery of Cape of Good Hope to the 17th century it was one of the chief commercial centres of Europe. Birthplace of St. Antony of Padua, Albuquerque, Camões. Mean temp. (30 yrs.), yr. 60°, Jan. 50°, Aug. 71°, max. 100°, min. 31°; rfall., 30 in. in 138 days; dominant wind, N. P. (1551) 100,000; (1878) 246,300; (1890) 307,700. [J. B. R.]

Lithuanians, a people, about 3,000,000, of Indo-European origin, inhabiting several W. provs. of Russia, NE. part of Poland, Prussia, on the shores of the Baltic Sea, and the basins of the Niemen and Düna. Their terr. being clothed with thick forests, these latter played an important part in their history and early religion, which was maintained till the 14th century, and has left many traces until now. They were divided then into Borussians or Prussians, Letts or Latvis, Lithuanians (Litva, Letuvinkaï), and Zhmud' or Zmuds, Samoghitians; to which must be added the black-haired and warlike Yatvyags or Yadzvings, the Zhemgala (Semigallians), the Kors' or Courons, the Golad, and the Krivichi in Smolensk. They formed a powerful state under Gedymin in 1316, and seventy-five years later the Lithuanian king, Yagello, married the Queen of Poland, Yadviga, and was crowned king of Poland. At the beginning of the 15th century Lithuania extended her dominions to Vyazma, Kaluga, Poltava, the Sea of Azov, and Odessa (Haji Bay). After the fall of the Polish republic, Lithuania proper became part of Russia.

Liverpool (formerly Lirpool, Litherpool, Liferpole, Leverpool), co. of a city, city, parl. and mun. bor., and seapt., comprising the parish of L., the tps. of Kirkdale and Everton, and parts of the townships of West Derby and Toxteth Park, in SW. of co. Lancaster, on E. side of the estuary of the Mersey, about 4 m. from the Irish Sea, 202 m. (by rail) NW. London, and 31 m. WSW. Manchester. Lat. of observatory, 53° 24′ 3″–8″ N., long. 3° 4′ 17″ W. The city stands partly on level ground along the Mersey, and partly on a gentle slope. Among the more noteworthy public buildings is the Town Hall, rebuilt in 1795, occupying one side of a square, the other three sides are formed by the Exchange Buildings, with a magnificent newsroom 175 ft. by 90 ft.; the Municipal Buildings; the Revenue Buildings, comprising the Custom-House, Post-Office, Dock-Office, &c.; St. George's Hall, with the Assize Courts, a magnificent building of the Corinthian order, standing on 3½ ac. of ground; the Free Public Library and Museum, the gift of Sir William Brown, opened 1864 (library of over 100,000 vols., with branch lending libraries in various parts of the town); the Walker Art Gallery, opened 1877; the Picton Reading and Lecture Rooms, with accommodation for 300 readers; and the Athenæum, opened 1799, and containing a valuable library of nearly 40,000 vols. The Church of St. Peter, built in 1704, serves at present as the cathedral church, L. having been constituted a separate see in 1880. Foremost amongst the educational establishments is University College, founded 1881. In 1884 the Royal Medical School was amalgamated with it, and in the same year the college was affiliated to the Victoria University [Manchester]. The buildings, on a site of 4 ac., consist of four separate blocks, containing the physical and biological, the medical, and the chemical departments, and the new college. In addition to these is the Victorian Building, completed in 1892, the gift of Mr. H. Tate, containing lecture theatre, library, &c. University College authorities comprise the president, vice-presidents, court of governors, council, treasurer, and senate. Professorships sixteen, each chair having an endowment of £10,000. Number of students nearly 450. Many exhibitions and scholarships are attached to the college. Other educational institutions are L. College, the Government School of Art and Nautical College. The principal general hospitals are the Royal Infirmary, Royal Southern, Northern, and Stanley, besides several special hospitals. There are also many charitable institutions. Public baths and wash-houses are provided by the Corporation in various parts of the town. There are several markets, of which the finest, St. John's, was erected in 1820–22, at a cost of over £36,000. The new waterworks, for which powers had been obtained in 1880, were completed in 1893. The water is conveyed from Lake Vyrnwy in N. Wales to the reservoirs at Prescott, 8 m. from L., by an aqueduct 68 m. in length, in the course of which are two tunnels, one of 2½ m. under the hills, the other under the Mersey. The estimated daily yield is 52,000,000 gallons. To form the Vyrnwy reservoir (1165 ac.), a great dam was built across the valley, a whole village, several farmhouses, and a highway being submerged. Public parks include Sefton (about 250 ac.), in the S., elaborately laid out; Stanley, in Walton (100 ac.); Shiel, in West Derby; Newsham, in Fairfield (150 ac.); Edgehill (34 ac.); and Wavertree. The principal cemeteries are the Necropolis, St. James, Walton, and Toxteth. L. has communication by rail with all parts of the country. The L. and Leeds Canal also connects it with the manufacturing dists. of Lancashire and Yorkshire. The principal railways are connected by central underground lines. Two special railways are the Mersey Tunnel, connecting L. with Birkenhead, and the Overhead Electrical Rly., opened Feb. 4, 1893, extending along the docks for 6½ m., constructed almost entirely of iron, at a cost of about £600,000. The Dock Rly., mainly underneath the Electrical, gives off branches to the goods stations. The estuary of the Mersey, ¾ m. broad at L., widening inland to an extreme of 3 m., is obstructed by shoals, but with well-marked channels navigable at high water for the largest vessels. A channel 1403 ft. wide is now, however, being dredged through the bar to allow of deep-drafted vessels entering and leaving the port at all states of the tide. Formerly the depth on the bar at low water spring tides was only about 11 ft., but in March 1895 a depth of 22 ft. at that state of the tide had already been effected. The Mersey was rendered navigable for vessels of moderate size to Warrington in 1694. In 1710 an Act of Parliament was obtained, authorising improvements in the harbour, and the levying of a duty on tonnage for twenty-one years. In 1740 the first dock was constructed on the Mersey. The docks (more than thirty) now extend along the L. side for over 6 m., and on the Birkenhead side for 1 m. They are under the control of the 'Mersey Docks and Harbour Board,' incorporated by Act of Parliament 1857, with jurisdiction over the whole estuary. Total area of docks and basins, 545½ ac.; length of quayage, 35 m., of which 381 ac. docks, and 25½ m. quayage belong to L. side. Most of the docks have half-tide locks and wet basins. Warehouse room attached to the docks has been much extended. At the Herculaneum Dock is the largest petroleum magazine in the world, cut out of the solid rock, and capable of containing 60,000 barrels. The town owes its chief importance to its great foreign trade; it is the main outlet for the manufactures of Lancashire, W. Yorkshire, and Staffordshire, and monopolises the principal share of British trade with Australia, America, India, Africa, and the Mediterranean. The expansion of its commerce since the opening of the first dock, is shown by the following figures:—In 1739 there were 211 vessels of 30 to 400 tons belonging to the port. In 1751 the total number of ships entering was 543, tonnage 31,713; in 1791, 2068 ships, tonnage 267,196; in 1805, ships 1855, tonnage 331,209. In 1831 the tonnage had risen to 1,592,436, in 1851 to 3,737,666, and in 1871 to 6,131,745. For later statistics of the port, see Appendix, pp. 13, 14. Exports of British produce, cotton (by far the most important), linen, and woollen goods and wool, hardware and machinery, china and glass, refined sugar, salt, alkali, gunpowder. Imports, chiefly cotton (more than ⅓ of all the cotton imported into the United Kingdom) and grain; other leading imports are cattle, provisions, fruits, tobacco, sugar, leather, palm-oil, &c. The construction of large merchant and war-vessels is extensively carried on; there are also large engine, cable, and anchor factories, iron and brass foundries, sugar refineries, breweries, glass-staining works, &c. L. was founded in the reign of King John as a convenient base of communication with Ireland. Henry III. granted a charter of incorporation. Although a place of some note, L. was a small town two centuries ago, and was only constituted a separate parish in 1699, it having previously formed part of Walton. In 1700 the population is said to have been 5714, but in 1760 it had risen to 25,000, and in 1790 to 55,000. The origin of the first part of the name 'L.' is uncertain; some authorities suppose it to be the name of an unknown waterfowl, called the 'lever' or 'liver,' while others think that it is derived from an old Gothic word 'lide' or 'lithe' = the 'sea,' or 'lither' = lower. The latter part of the name appears to have been given from a fen or pool formed by a branch of the Mersey. Birthplace of Mrs. Hemans, the poetess, and Roscoe, the historian. The bor. sends nine members to the House of Commons, one for each of the following divs:—Abercromby, West Derby, Everton, Exchange, Kirkdale, Scotland, E. and W., Toxteth, and Walton. Mean temp. (20 yrs.), yr. 48.8° F., Jan. 39.4°, July 60.0°; mean rfall. (25 yrs.), 29.01 in. Acreage of co. bor. 6552; of parl. bor. 8107. P. (1801) 82,295; (1821) 138,000; (1831) 202,000; (1851) 376,000; (1871) 493,000; (1891) 518,000; parl. bor. P. (1891) 584,500. The population of L., in a geographical sense, comprising the registration dists. of L., Toxteth Park, West Derby, and Birkenhead, in 1891 was 860,000.

Llanberis, par., N. Wales, Carnarvonshire, Arfon div., containing an old village, 7 m. ESE. Carnarvon, on a branch of the L. & NW. R. In a romantic valley at the foot of Snowdon (to the top of which there is a pony path), between two small lakes, the upper, 1 m. long, called Llyn Peris; the lower, 2 m. long, called Llyn Padarn, drained NW. by the Seiont into the Menai Strait. The old village, at the distance of 2½ m., is SE. of the modern town of L. (above Llyn Peris). Along the shores of Llyn Peris, which extends to the beginning of the pass in the old village, huge glacial boulders can be seen. Sir Andrew Ramsay describes Cwm Glas, in the Pass of Llanberis, as one of the most extensive glacier valleys—the moraine heaps, boulders, and roches moutonnées abounding everywhere. Dolbadarn Castle, on Llyn Padarn, of which only a solitary tower remains, was a stronghold of the Welsh during the wars of conquest in the reign of Edward I. Close to new Llanberis is a fine waterfall, called Ceunant Mawr. Fishing in the lakes and streams; char, trout, and salmon abound. Important slate quarries, giving employment to about 2500 men. A coach road (to Bettws-y-Coed, Beddgelert, and Capel Curig) leads SE. across L. Pass, a magnificent defile, the highest point of which is 1180 ft. above sea-level. 10,468 ac. P.<3000.

Lob-nor, or Lop Nor, formerly a large lake which constituted the final receptacle of the waters of the Tarim in Eastern Turkistan, stretching for about 70 m. WSW. to ENE., between about 88½° and 90° E. and 39½°–39⅝° N. At the time of Przhevalsky's visits in 1877 and 1882, the lake was of fresh water in the W. and salt in the E., and formed rather an expansion of the Tarim, flowing with a distinct current till it finally disappeared in the salt-encrusted sands. In 1882 the lake was much smaller than in 1877; and at the time of the visit of Prince Henry of Orléans, towards the end of 1889, the lake seems to have been transformed into a number of interlacing lakes and river-arms, the contraction of the water-area being probably due to the using up of the waters of the Tarim for irrigation by the increasing population of the river basin. There is a village of Lob at the W. end of the former lake, and Marco Polo (13th century) mentions a city and prov. of Lob in this region. Alt. of lake, 2600 ft.

Lofö, isl., Sweden, in Lake Mälar, with a village of the same name 7 m. W. Stockholm.

Lofoten, Lofoden, or Loffoden Islands, an archipelago of Norway, within the Arctic Circle, North Sea, between 67° 40′ and 69° 21′ N., 12° and 17° E., the L. proper (the more southerly members of the group—Ost- and Vest-Vagö, Moskenäso, and the small islands of Väro, Röst, and Skomvär, this last the southernmost of all) separated from the coast by the Bay of Vestfjord, 15 to 40 m. broad, the more northerly members (including all the larger islands—Hindö, Langö, Andö) being distinguished by the name of Vesteraalen. Permanent population, 4000; but in the cod-fishing season (January, February, and March) they are occupied by from 15–20,000 fishermen, who come with their boats and fishing-tackle from all the coasts of the northern half of Norway, with provisions for two months. Upwards of 30,000,000 cod-fish are generally caught in the season. The whole group lies on a shallow bank which extends 50 m. N. of the group, but reaches furthest W. in the extreme S., where the bottom increases from 50 fathoms or less in depth to one of 150 fathoms, a sudden increase then taking place between 60 and 70 m. W. of Skomvär. Northwards the W. margin of this bank gradually trends inwards towards the land. On the E. side the bank slopes from a depth of about 40 to less than 70 fathoms, a broad rocky ledge near the latter depth running along the whole shore. (See Proc. R. G. S., 1886, p. 724; 1887, p. 380.) The E., or inner, bank is the great seat of the fisheries, the outer side having few harbours of refuge, and being exposed to the high seas of the Arctic Ocean. The herring-fishing of the L. is important; but it has fallen off lately owing to the fish having deserted their usual grounds. The islands are exposed to severe storms from the W., and violent currents set in between them. Near the S. end of the group is that called the Maelström, described as a violent whirlpool, the danger to be apprehended from which arises from the swell of the ocean during NW. winds. Mean temp. (Röst), yr. 39.7° F., Feb. 30.7°, Aug. 51.4°. Area of the Lofoten Is. (including the Vesteraalen), according to Broch, 2812 sq. m.; according to Strelbitsky, 2246 sq. m.

Loika, Lubi, or Itimbiri, riv., central Africa, Congo Free State, flows SW. into the Congo, which it enters in 2° N., 23° 6′ E.; navigable to the Lubi Falls, in 24° 10′ E.

Loing, the ancient Luna, riv., France, rises at St. Colombe, dep. Yonne, flows past Châtillon, Montargis, Nemours, and Moret, where it joins the Seine on the left. It feeds the canal of Briare and L., by means of which the Seine communicates with the Loire. Length, 100 m.; area of basin, 1730 sq. m.

Loir, the ancient Lidericus, riv., France, rises in the lagoon of Cernay, dep. Eure-et-Loir, flows past Châteaudun, Vendôme, Château-du-Loir, and Durtal, and joins the Sarthe on the left, 5 m. N. Angers. Length, 185 m., of which 71 are navigable for boats; volume, 280 cubic ft. per second; in flood, 14,100 cubic ft.

Loire, the ancient Liger, important riv., Europe, and the largest in France, rises in Mont Gerbier-de-Joncs, dep. Ardèche, at an elevation of 4510 ft., flows NNW. and W. past Roanne, Nevers, La Charité, Cosne, Gien, Orléans, Beaugency, Blois (where the Val de L., 'the garden of France,' begins), Amboise, Tours, Saumur, Ancenis, Nantes, where its volume is more than 24,700 cubic ft., and Paimbœuf, and enters the Bay of Biscay by a wide estuary below St. Nazaire, dep. Loire-Inférieure. Principal affluents on the right, the Lignon, Semène, Furens, Coise, Rahins, Sornin, Reconce, Arroux, Aron, Nièvre, Cèze, Authion, and Maine; on the left, the Borne, Ance, Lignon, Aix, Bèbre, Acolin, Allier, Loiret, and Cosson. It is classed as navigable to Roanne, dep. Loire, but is aided by canals, Roanne to Digoin 35 m., and Digoin to Briare 122 m. The tide is perceptible as far as Nantes. Its course is generally rapid, with an average volume of 34,800 cubic ft., and navigation is interrupted during five or six months in the year from want of water, overflowing, or freezing. Dykes and barrages have been constructed along a great part of its course, many of which were destroyed by a flood in 1856. The 'barre des Charpentiers' at the mouth has a depth of only 13 ft. at low water, but at high water vessels with a mean draught of 19 ft. are enabled, with the aid of a ship canal on the S. bank, 9½ m. in length (opened in Sept. 1892), to ascend to the port of Nantes. The Loire is connected by canals with the Saône, Seine, and Vilaine. There is steam communication between Moulins and Nantes, by means of the Allier and Loire. Length, 543 m.; area of basin, 46,756 sq. m. (Strelbitsky). See France, Rivers and Means of Internal Communication.

Loire, dep., central France, traversed from S. to N. by the Loire; formed in 1790 of parts of Lyonnais (dists. Forez, Beaujolais, and Lyonnais); divided into three arrs.: St. Étienne (cap.), Montbrison, and Roanne. A great part of the surface is mountainous. In the W. are the mountains of Forez, formed of granite and other Primitive rocks, and covered with forests of pine, culminating in Pierre-sur-Haute (5380 ft.), also the highest point in the dep. Northward the range is continued by the Bois Noir and the Madeline Hills, with declining elevation to 1640 ft. on the border of the dep., where the porphyritic rock is pierced by the railway tunnel of Saint-Martin d'Estreaux. In the E. is a series of ranges forming part of the continental watershed; these from S. to N. are Lyonnais, Tarare, Beaujolais, and Charolais; highest point, Mont de Boussièvre (3295 ft.). In the SE. the Mont Pilat group rises above the Rhone valley. Near the N. and S. frontiers of the dep. the E. and W. ranges approach, leaving only a narrow gorge for the passage of the river. In the centre is the plain of Forez, a marshy tract about 12 m. in breadth, the bed of a former lake, from which rise some thirty mounds, probably of volcanic origin. The dep. belongs mainly to the basin of the L.; principal tribs., r. bk., Rhin; l. bk., Lignon and Aix; about one-eighth of the surface is drained to the Rhone, which forms the SE. boundary for 6 m.; a r. bk. trib., the Gier, has its upper course in the dep. The L. is classed as navigable throughout the dep., but navigability depends on the lateral canal which accompanies it from Roanne. Climate healthy, except in the marshy dists. [Nantes]. Rye, wheat, and barley are the principal cereals. Vineyards cover nearly one-tenth of the surface, but the yield of wine per acre is under the average for the country. The most important mineral is coal, in the production of which the dep. ranks third in France; it is mined at Bérandière, Firminy, Roche-la-Molière, Saint-Étienne, &c. Metallurgical industries take the first rank; they include heavy iron and steel goods, rails, armour-plates for ships, engines, arms, &c., all of which are extensively produced. The manufacture of ribbons, centred at St.-Étienne, is also a leading industry. Area, 1853 sq. m. P. (1891) 616,200. See France, table.

Loire, Haute-, dep., central France, traversed S. to N. by the torrential upper course of the Loire; formed of parts of Languedoc (Velay, Vivarvais, and Gévaudan), Auvergne (Bassi-Auvergne), and Lyonnais (Forez); divided into three arrs.: Le Puy (cap.), Brioude, and Yssingeaux. Formed mainly of Primitive rocks (granite, gneiss, &c.) overlaid with thick volcanic beds. About one-sixth of the dep. belongs to the central plateau of France (mean elevation 2955 ft.), traversed by numerous gorges, with a few wider valleys, of which the largest is that of the Allier, near Brioude. Culminating point of dep. Mont Mézenc (5755 ft.), on the frontier of Ardèche, whence the Boutières range runs N. to Mont Pilat, in Loire; highest point, Grand Felletin (4560 ft.). The Mégal, or Meygal, a sharply serrated range, is separated from the preceding by the valley of the Lignon. Between the Loire and the Allier are the Velay Mts., with long gentle slopes, and many traces of former volcanic activity; highest point, Bois de l'Hôpital (4670 ft.). W. of the Allier, on the frontier of Lozère and Cantal, is the Margeride, a granitic range in part well-wooded, of which the highest summit in L. is (4910 ft.). The S. part of the dep. consists of a monotonous but fertile plain broken by low mounds. With the exception of a few streams going to the Rhone from the E., the dep. is drained entirely to the L., either directly or through the Allier. Principal tribs. of L. in the dep. are Lignon Vellave (r. bk.) and Ance (l. bk.); principal tribs. of Allier, Senouire (r. bk.) and Alagnon (l. bk., in Puy-de-Dôme). Climate rigorous, owing to elevation and northward aspect of principal valleys. Rye is the principal cereal most largely cultivated; barley and oats each cover about one-third the area under rye. The vine occupies about 1½ per cent. of the surface; production of wine per acre is below the average for France. The most important mineral is coal (Brassac and Langeac basins). Manufactures are inconsiderable. Area, 1931 sq. m. P. (1891) 316,700. See France, table.

Loire-Inférieure, maritime dep., W. France, traversed E. to W. by Loire R., formed of part of Bretagne, divided into five arrs.: Nantes (cap.), Ancenis, Châteaubriant, Pambœuf, and Saint-Nazaire. The coast is rugged in parts, with stretches of sand-dunes, and indented with several bays. Surface generally low and monotonous; one of the least elevated dists. of France, culminating point in extreme NE. only 375 ft. On the r. bk. of Loire R. is a range of granite hillocks, the Sillon de Bretagne, rising abruptly to 195–260 ft. W. of Savenay are tracts of bog, often submerged, known as the Brières, where peat is cut for fuel; largest, Grand-Brière, about 30 sq. m. Near the coast are extensive salt-marshes. The dist. S. of the L. is called 'Pays de Retz' or 'de Rais'; it contains the lake of Grand-Lieu. The dep. belongs chiefly to the basin of the L., partly also to that of the Vilaine, which forms its NW. frontier for 22 m.; it receives l. bk. tribs. Don and Isac. Principal tribs. of L. in the dep. are Erdre, r. bk., and Sèvre Nantaise, l. bk. The Achenau, or Chenau, an artificial stream, drains Grand-Lieu. Wheat is the principal cereal; the cultivation of the vine is limited; flax is an important crop. The principal forests are those of Gâvre, 17 sq. m., and St. Gildas in NW. Coal is mined at Montrelais and Monzeil; iron is abundant in the NE. at Rouge, Meilleraye, and Sion; salt is obtained in large quantities from the coast marshes. Of manufactures, metallurgical industries take the first rank; the principal are engine-works, forges, foundries of iron, copper, and bell-metal, and brass-work (Nantes), shipbuilding (Nazaire and other coast towns). Area, 2695 sq. m. P. (1891) 645,300. See France, table.

Loiret, the ancient Ligurala, riv., France, dep. Loiret, rises in two springs 2 m. SSE. Orléans, and joins the Loire on the left near Orléans. Length, 10 m.

Loiret, dep., central France, traversed from SE. to NW. and SW. by the Loire, which divides it into two unequal parts; formed mainly of parts of Orléannais, with a small dist. from Berri; divided into four arrs.: Orléans (cap.), Gien, Montargis, and Pithiviers. The region N. of the L. comprises dist. Beauce, NW., and Gâtinais Orléannais, NE.; the former, a Calcareous plateau (395–490 ft.), separating the basins of the Loire and Seine, covers about one-fourth of the dep. It is dreary and almost treeless, with little surface water, but of great fertility, producing large quantities of cereals, and forming part of the dist. known as the 'granary of France.' The Gâtinais, covering about one-third of the dep., is well-wooded and well-watered. S. of the Loire is the Sologne, formerly a desolate and malarial region, now in great part reclaimed by the planting of fir-trees, which has resulted in the formation of a new vegetable soil over the impermeable clay which formerly rendered the surface a marsh in winter and an arid waste in summer. The highest point (900 ft.) in the dep. is in the SE.; the lowest (225 ft.) in the NE., at the exit of the Loing. The dep. belongs partly to the Loire basin and partly to the Seine; the former traverses it for 80 m.; navigable throughout, receiving many small tribs., including the Loiret (l. bk.). To the basin of the Seine belong the Loing and the Essonne, both flowing N. In its upper course the Loing is accompanied by the canal of Briare to Montargis, and in its lower course by the Loing canal, which is joined by the Orléans canal from SW. Climate, see Orléans. Oats and wheat are the principal cereals; the vine covers nearly 4 per cent. of the surface, but the production of wine per acre is below the average for France; sugar-beet is an important culture, and Orléans asparagus is noted. Forests, Orléans, the largest in France (155 sq. m.), and Montargis (30 sq. m.). Metalliferous minerals are not found, but building-stone is quarried in many places. Manufactures have declined; earthenware is made in the Orléans dist., fine porcelain at Gien. Area, 2630 sq. m. P. (1891) 377,700. See France, table.

Loir-et-Cher, dep., central France, divided into two nearly equal parts by the Loire, which traverses it from NE. to SW., formed out of parts of Orléannais and Touraine, chiefly the former; divided into three arrs.: Blois (cap.), Romorantin, and Vendôme. The region N. of the Loire belongs to the dists. of Beauce and Perche, separated from each other by the Loir; that to the SE. to Sologne. Soil argillaceous and calcareous in the valleys; sandy and arid in most parts. Much of the Sologne has been rendered cultivable by drainage and the use of fertilisers. Surface of slight elevation, highest in the Perche dist. (which is also the most diversified), Cormont (840 ft.) declining towards the S. Low ranges of hills, sometimes forming abrupt cliffs, border the rivers, especially the Loir. The dep. belongs entirely to Loire basin, principal tribs. of which are Cosson and Beuvron (l. bk.), and Cisse (r. bk.), the Loir in N. flowing SW. and W., and the Cher in S. (with a r. bk. affluent, Sauldre) flowing W., join the Loire outside the dep. The principal cereals are oats, wheat, and rye; the vine covers about 3 per cent. of the surface, but the production per acre is below the average. Forests cover about one-sixth of the dep.; the principal are those of Marchenoir, Boulogne (15.4 sq. m.), Russy (12 sq. m.), and Blois. Climate, see Vendôme. Stone is extensively quarried at Bourré and other places, alabaster at Essarts. Manufactures are comparatively insignificant; the principal are textiles, grouped chiefly in the SE. about Romorantin; glass, especially for scientific instruments; paper, &c. Area, 2479 sq. m. P. (1891) 280,400. See France, table.

Lolos, independent tribe, occupying the mountainous region, about 11,000 sq. m. in extent, known as Liang-shan ('ridge mountains'), or Taliang-shan ('great ridge mountains'), in the SW. of the Chinese prov. of Süchwan, between the Kienchang valley on the W. and the Yangtse-kiang on the E. An exceptionally tall race, well-built and muscular. The men wear all their hair twisted up into a knot over their forehead and wrapt in cotton cloth so as to resemble a horn. They live by agriculture and hunting. Their chief clothing is a sleeveless mantle of grey or black felt. Some of them have submitted to the Chinese, and mingle with them, adopting Chinese manners. The name L. is a term of insult not used by themselves. Their own name for themselves varies at different places—Losu, Nosu, Ngosu, or Lesu. See *R. G. Lombardo-Venetian Kingdom, from 1815 to 1859 a political and administrative div. of the Austrian Empire in Italy, forming two govts. Lombardy was formed in 1814 of part of the kingdom of Italy, created by Napoleon I. The Congress of Vienna recognised it as a possession of the Austrian Empire. War having been declared between Austria and Sardinia, an Austrian army crossed the Ticino on April 29, 1859. The allies defeated the Austrians in the battles of Montebello, May 20, and Magenta, June 4. Napoleon III. and the King of Sardinia entered Milan, June 8, and the decisive battle of Solferino was fought on June 24. By the Treaty of Villafranca, July 11, Lombardy, as far as the Mincio, except the fortresses of Mantua and Peschiera, was ceded to France, and handed over to Sardinia; Venetia, or Venice, the E. portion of the former kingdom, was in 1866 transferred to the kingdom of Italy.

Lom'bardy, div. (compartimento territoriale), Italy, composed of the N. central part of the Po basin, including the Alpine region from the Lago Maggiore to Lake Garda (the boundary running through the middle of both these lakes), and thus comprising the small Italian portion of Lake Lugano, the whole of Lake Como, with the Valtellina (prov. Sondrio), the Val Brembana, Val Seriana, and Val Cavallina in prov. Bergamo, and in the prov. of Brescia Lake Iseo, with the Val Camonica to the N., and the Val Trompia, which opens S. on the town of Brescia; and including in the plains the dist. of Lomellina between the lower Sesia and lower Ticino; the whole div. mainly N. of the Po, but embracing the portion of the prov. of Mantua S. of that river in the E., and a wedge of the Apennines containing part of the upper course of the Trebbia between Piedmont and Emilia in the W. As to climate, see Italy, Milan, Brescia. Principal cereal, maize; next in importance, wheat (occupying about half the area of wheat); rice grown to a considerable extent, chiefly in provs. Pavia and Milan, then in Mantua and Cremona; flax chiefly in prov. Cremona, hemp in Mantua; wine produced most abundantly relatively to area in prov. Pavia. The chief mineral is iron ore, a pure carbonate of high quality produced in the dist. of Oltrepovo, near the extreme NE. of prov. Bergamo, and utilised in the iron and steel works of Castro, near the N. end of Lake Iseo, and in the Val Camonica and Val Trompia (prov. Brescia). Next in importance is zinc, a band of calamine about 550 yards in width, extending for about 20 m. from about the middle of the Val Brembana towards the NE. of the prov. of Bergamo, and worked at Gorno, Premolo, and Oneto. L. is the chief seat of the Italian silk industry in all its more important branches, silk-weaving being centred at Como. In the middle ages the present Lombardy for the most part shared the fortunes of the city of Milan, which has always been the chief city of the region. See Italy, table and History, Milan, and Lombardo-Venetian Kingdom.

There are fifteen islands in the lake; the largest, Inchmurrin, is 1½ m. long; Inchmoan is flat and wooded; Inch Cruin is also flat; the rest are hilly. The lake is surrounded by mountains and valleys, displaying striking scenes of grandeur and beauty. It receives the Endrick, Luss, Fruin, and other streams, and discharges its surplus waters, at its S. extremity, into the Firth of Clyde by the riv. Leven—a name which anciently belonged to the lake itself. Steamers ply in summer for the accommodation of tourists, and there are fine drives on its E. and W. shores. Area, 27¼ sq. m. Length N. to S. 21 m.; greatest breadth at S. end 4½ m., at Luss upwards of 2 m., and at N. end nearly ½ m. Greatest depth, between Tarbet and Inveruglas, 630 ft.; at N. end, 120 ft.; at S. end, 66 ft. [Ben Lomond.]

London, the capital of the British Empire, and centre of commerce and finance for the entire globe, owes its origin to the site; and the geographical position explains much of its political importance, its unexampled growth and wealth. So complex is the aggregate, that there are officially more than a dozen Londons. To the historian, our capital is composed of two cities, and many other towns, villages, and hamlets formerly suburban; to the legislator, it is composed of twenty-seven parliamentary bors., returning sixty-one members to the House. The original nucleus, the city proper, never was in Middlesex, being a county in itself; and recently the present capital has been created into a 'County of London,' which embraces all the suburban pars. of Middlesex, Surrey, and Kent. As soon as the city within the walls was officially joined to the city of Westminster, London became the capital of England.

When the Romans rowed their galleys up the Thames, they at length saw a remarkable height on the north bank separating the two broad lagoon-estuaries which covered much of modern Middlesex, and stretched up the flat valley of the Lee. The native Celts had already called the height Linndun or Llyndon, the 'pool-fort,' the 'hill over the lagoons.' It was a strategic point, the Thames there being only two-thirds as broad as at Westminster, and the dun being defended on the W. by the steep banks of the riv. Fleet, on the E. by the Lee marshes, and on the N. by fens and forests. The Roman town (Londinium) soon became a commercial centre—maxime celebre, says Tacitus, 'for its many traders and its stores of commodities.' The military way from Dover divided before reaching the Thames, one branch to cross at Westminster in the line of Edgware Road, the other to cross at Old London Bridge in the line of Gracechurch Street, Bishopsgate, and Kingsland Road. Watling Street, behind St. Paul's Cathedral, and 'London Stone' are survivals of the pretorian way that went NW. from the Bridge to join the great Roman road which passed across from Colchester westward in the line of Cheapside and Oxford Street. The waste land N. of London wall explains the names Moorfields, Moorgate, *Fens*bury, just as the eyots or islets and hithes or creeks left by the lagoons explain Bermond's-ey, Overe*y*, Chelse*y*, Thorne*y*, Batterse*y*, Rother*hithe*, Lam*hithe* (Lambeth), Queen*hithe*. Such names were given by the Early English, after Alfred and his grandson had fortified London against the Danes, made it their capital, and laid the foundation of its municipal government. They also named Aldersgate, Newgate, Moorgate, Lydgate (= posterngate), &c. Saxon London had two market-places, 'East Cheap,' with Cornhill on the N., and 'West Cheap,' with Cheapside on the N., an important thoroughfare to Westgate or Newgate. At West Cheap met the Folk Mote, afterwards known as the Court of Common Hall, and still represented by the Lord Mayor and Corporation. St. Paul's Church was in West Cheap.

As a measure of the size and extent of our present capital, four definitions may be given: (1) Registration London, or that of the Census and Poor Law; (2) County Council London, or that under the School Board, and formerly under the Board of Works; (3) Parliamentary London; and (4) Police London, or the 'Metropolitan Area,' within 12 m. of Charing Cross. The second, called also the Administrative County, includes the City, and is equal in area to the first, increased by the civil parish of Penge. The fourth, the greatest of all the areas, and called 'Greater London,' is the dist. under the Metropolitan and City Police, made up of Registration London and the 'Outer Ring.' Besides the whole of Middlesex, 'Greater London' has 34 parishes in Surrey (80,058 ac.), including Croydon, Epsom, Richmond, Kingston, Sutton, &c.; 18 in Kent (42,516 ac.), including Bromley, Chislehurst, &c.; 14 in Essex (60,466 ac.), including Ilford, West Ham, &c.; 13 in Herts (35,893 ac.), including Barnet, Enfield, &c. The total area of Greater London is 690 sq. m., or 26½ m. square. The third London is that formed since 1885 by the following 27 parliamentary boroughs, each of which, except the City, may be referred to under its own name: Battersea and Clapham, Bethnall Green, Camberwell, Chelsea, City, Deptford, Finsbury, Fulham, Greenwich, Hackney, Hammersmith, Hampstead, Islington, Kensington, Lambeth, Lewisham, Marylebone, Newington, Paddington, St. Pancras, Shoreditch, Southwark, Tower Hamlets, Wandsworth, West Ham, Westminster, Woolwich. These boroughs contain 60 constituencies, each returning one Member of Parliament, except the City, which returns two members. For comparison we also give the data before 1885, when only 22 Members of Parliament were returned, viz., 4 for the City, and 2 each for Westminster, Lambeth, Southwark, Tower Hamlets, Finsbury, Hackney, Marylebone, Chelsea, and Greenwich. The following table gives statistics of those four leading 'Metropolitan Areas' for the last four decennial periods:—

Throughout the Middle Ages the municipal government of London was vested in the City Corporation, with powers and privileges defined by many acts and charters. The suburban parishes were regulated by their vestries under local acts. In 1855, on the appointment of the Metropolitan Board of Works, there were 38 vestries and dist. boards. Of the 45 members of the Board of Works, 3 were chosen by the City, 2 each by the 6 parishes—Islington, Marylebone, St. Pancras, Lambeth, St. George's (Hanover Square), and Shoreditch, and the rest by the other parishes and dists. In 1889 that governing body was replaced by the London County Council, with jurisdiction over the same area, but with greater powers. The chairman, elected annually, is by virtue of his office a justice of the peace for the county. The area administered consists of 30 dists., coextensive with the Poor Law Unions, and contains 196 civil parishes. Ecclesiastically, it is partly in 4 dioceses—Canterbury, London, Rochester, and St. Alban's. There are 118 councillors, and 19 aldermen; and their duties, which extend over 25 parishes in Middlesex, 5 in Kent, and 6 in Surrey, require eighteen standing committees to be appointed, besides several special committees.

The 'City and Liberties' of London (including the borough of Southwark) have not been greatly affected by the new County Council, being still administered in 26 wards by the Corporation, consisting of the Lord Mayor, 26 aldermen, and 206 common councilmen. Other ancient officers are the sheriffs, the recorder, the chamberlain, and the town clerk. The chief magistrate is annually chosen from those aldermen who have been sheriffs. Guilds, or 'livery companies,' representing ancient trade unions, having gradually acquired great influence through their control of the trade in the city, became very rich, partly by monopolies and partly by certain charges and donations. These guilds, of which there were formerly more than a hundred, now number seventy-six. The rental of their property in the City exceeds £500,000, and their land outside is probably as much in value. In recent times the business of the City Companies, unless when administering their charities or assisting in technical education, street improvements, &c., is mainly ceremonial. The presentation of the newly elected Lord Mayor to the Lord Chief Justice on November 9 gives occasion for the famous civic pageant called the Lord Mayor's Show. As the population of the capital kept increasing, that of the City has steadily diminished, according to the census, which only takes note of the night population. In 1891 it was 37,705, against 50,652 in 1881, i.e., about $\frac{1}{13}$ of 'Greater London.' The day population, however, was 301,000 in 1891, against 261,000 in 1881. The area of the City is 671 acres, or $\frac{1}{674}$ of 'Greater London.' The yearly income of the City Corporation is £670,000; and the profits paying income-tax have been assessed at more than £70,000,000, that of the United Kingdom being £239,000,000.

Down to the beginning of the present century, all estimates of the population of London are doubtful. In 1349, according to Stow, 50,000 were buried after the Plague, implying a population of not less than 90,000. From the Subsidy Rolls of 1377, Chalmers and Thorold Rogers derive a population of 35,000. Botero's estimate for 1590 is 160,000 'more or less.' Graunt (1661) makes 460,000; Sir W. Petty (1683), 696,000; Gregory King (1694), 530,000; Richman (1701), 674,000; and Maitland (1738), 726,000. The following table gives the successive results for each decade of the present century, with the percentage in each case to the population of all England and Wales, and the decennial increase per cent.:—

The growth of London has for ages been continuous. Not till the 13th century was Westminster joined to it by the houses built along the river-strand, passing the village of Charing, now centre of 'Larger London.' In the 16th century the nobles built town residences along the Strand to be out of the city, e.g., Northumberland House, recently removed to build an imposing avenue to the Thames Embankment; Exeter House, built by Lord Burleigh, on the site of the present Exeter Hall. Under James I., St. Clement Danes, St. Giles in the Fields, St. Martins in the Fields, Clerkenwell, Shoreditch, Whitechapel, and Bermondsey were new parishes added. Then Hackney, Islington, Lambeth, Newington, Rotherhithe, and Stepney. Under William III., Soho Square and Golden Square were built for the wealthier citizens moving W.; and about 1720, Hanover and Cavendish Squares. 'Mayfair' (named from a fair previously held here in the fields during that month), to the N. of Green Park and E. of Hyde Park, grew up in the early years of George III.; and during the first half of the present century 'Tyburnia' (named from the Tyburn brook, &c.), N. of Hyde Park, and 'Belgravia,' between Knightsbridge and the Thames, had their fields and nursery gardens replaced by fashionable streets and squares. In the last twenty years many handsome houses have covered a great part of South Kensington, and the best sites of Bayswater, Notting Hill, Regent's Park, besides innumerable picturesque spots in more suburban dists., such as Hampstead and Harrow, Sydenham, Putney Heath, Wimbledon, and Richmond. Many city merchants go further afield, and have their homes in Sussex, Herts, Bucks, or Berks.

Much of the topography of the western suburbs is explained by the streams Hole-burn (or Holborn), Tyburn, and Westburn (or Westbourne), which flowed S. from the northern heights of Highgate and Hampstead. Hole-bourne was really the Fleet, whose valley is still seen under the Holborn Viaduct or E. of Gray's Inn Road, and gave name to Holborn Hill, Saffron Hill, Back Hill, and Breakneck Steps; while Ship Court, Seacoal Lane, refer to its use as a tidal river. Farringdon Road and other streets show its course, which also explains the irregular boundary on the W. of Clerkenwell parish. The next stream further W. is the Ty-burn, which formerly gave name to the parish of Marylebone, as well as to a village near the Oxford Road (now Oxford Street), in the hollow half-way between Oxford Circus and the Marble Arch. This 'burn' winded by the side of Marylebone Lane, when a country path, on its way from the W. of Regent's Park to the Green Park, passing near Buckingham Palace to reach the Thames E. of the Abbey of Westminster (originally built on Thorney Island, formed by the Tyburn), with another branch at Vauxhall Bridge. Tyburn village and brook gave its name to the gibbet erected on the height beyond, at the corner made by the Oxford (or Tyburn) Road and Edgeware Road. The church at Tyburn decaying, another was built further up the stream and called St. Mary-le-Bourne, now Marylebone. A mile further W. the Oxford Road descends to cross the West-bourne, or Bayswater stream. It forms the Serpentine in Kensington Gardens, gives name to Knightsbridge, where the Western Road from Piccadilly crossed it, and joins the Thames at Chelsea Bridge, having Sloane Street built all along its right bank. Gloucester and Westbourne Terraces, Bayswater, are along its banks, and in Maida Vale and Kilburn its course determines the line of several streets. The Oxford or Uxbridge Road, still further W., crossed a stream dividing Notting Hill from Shepherd's Bush. There are traces of it in the fields E. of Wormwood Scrubs. Throughout its course it separated Kensington and Chelsea parishes from Hammersmith and Fulham, finally joining the Thames opposite Battersea.

The great buildings belonging to the Crown are: (1) Westminster Hall, famous in English history, 290 ft. long and 110 high, now a sort of vestibule for both Houses of Parliament; (2) the Houses of Parliament, or Palace of Westminster, the largest Gothic building applied to civil purposes, with a handsome façade 900 ft. long overlooking the river, a clock tower 320 ft. high, and the Victoria Tower 340 ft.; (3) the Banqueting Hall, Whitehall, now a royal chapel—central window from which Charles I. stepped on the scaffold; (4) St. James's Palace, still used for court purposes; (5) Buckingham Palace, the Queen's town residence, fine grounds, and gallery of Dutch painters; (6) Marlborough House, Pall Mall, residence of the Prince of Wales, designed by Wren; (7) Kensington Palace, in Kensington Gardens; (8) the Tower of London, east of the City, used as a palace, a state-prison, as well as a fortress, now a repository for the regalia of England and much ancient armour; (9) Somerset House, in the Strand, seen to great advantage from the river, now serves for government offices, as those of the Exchequer, the Inland Revenue, the Registrar-General, and others; (10) the Admiralty, between Charing Cross and Whitehall, in course of reconstruction; (11) the Horse Guards, headquarters of the Commander-in-Chief; (12) the Treasury, the Privy Council Office, the Education Office, and the Board of Trade occupy a large square structure extending from Dover House, office of the Secretary for Scotland and the Scotch Education staff, to the historical Downing Street, which contains the official residences of the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer; (13) south of Downing Street is an extensive and handsome range in the Italian style, for the Home, Foreign, Colonial, and Indian Offices; (14) the General Post Office, St. Martin's-le-Grand, three handsome masses of structure, the oldest having a lofty central hall 80 ft. long; (15) the British Museum, with noble Ionic portico, famous collections of antiquities, library of 1,900,000 printed books and 214,000 MSS.; (16) the National Gallery of Paintings, with an extension on N. side to contain the National Portrait Gallery; (17) the South Kensington Museum of Science and Art, and that of Natural History, with a branch at Bethnall Green; (18) the Imperial Institute, founded 1888, to commemorate the jubilee of Her Majesty; (19) Burlington House, Piccadilly, appropriated to the Royal Academy, the Royal Society, the London University, and other learned bodies; (20) the New Law Courts, or 'Palace of Justice,' Temple Bar, a huge group of Gothic buildings, with a central hall 230 ft. long, and the Strand front, 500 ft. long, surmounted by a bell tower—the Supreme Courts consist of the High Court of Justice, the Court of Appeal, the Court of Chancery, the Queen's Bench, presided over by the Lord Chief Justice of England; (21) Chelsea Hospital, overlooking the river; (22) Greenwich Hospital, on the site of a palace, with handsome colonnades, picture-gallery with several statues and monuments, relics of Nelson. Of ordinary hospitals, the chief are the three great endowed ones, St. Bartholomew's, W. Smithfield, Guy's in Southwark, and St. Thomas's by Westminster Bridge; others are St. George's, Hyde Park Corner, the Middlesex, Westminster, Charing Cross, University College, King's College, the London (Whitechapel), the W. London, &c., besides many special ones. The Corporation owns several important buildings, such as the Guildhall, with its hall for State banquets, its courts of justice, museum, and free library; the Mansion House, or residence of the Lord Mayor, with a Corinthian portico and the Egyptian Hall. Most of the halls of the city companies are handsome structures. The City also contains St. Paul's Cathedral (370 ft. high), best seen from the river, and other fine churches designed by Wren. Many others of the various parishes throughout the capital deserve notice. Westminster Abbey, where our kings have been crowned since before the Norman Conquest, is famous for its monuments, its chapels, and the coronation chair containing the 'stone of Scone.'

Communications.—Before the building of the High Level Bridge, east of the Tower, London Bridge (928 ft. long) was the lowest as well as the most ancient of the Thames bridges. Till recent times it had been, since the earliest history of England, a main point of communication between the S. side and the N., and therefore formed an important factor in the building up of London's greatness. The present bridge was built in 1823–31, at a cost of £1,500,000. Old London Bridge, which till the middle of the 18th century was the only bridge in the capital, was some yards further E., in a line with the Monument, and had twenty arches, making the navigation dangerous, the present bridge having five. The old bridge, dating from 1170, was really a street of lofty houses, much admired by visitors for its stone towers and gates, its picturesque wooden houses projecting over the piers, and its three 'vacancies' for the passage of boats and ships. After 1754 the houses were removed and the waterway widened. As one of the means of relieving the present London Bridge, which has long been inadequate to the traffic, the Tower Bridge (or High Level Bridge) was built (1886–94) by the Corporation of the City.

Between two Gothic towers, 200 ft. apart, are two 'bascules,' level with the roadway, which are raised by hydraulic power to allow ships to pass, the towers being at the same time utilised to raise foot passengers to the 'high level' portion of the bridge. Total length of footway, 2640 ft.; total cost of the bridge, £750,000. Another relief to the passenger traffic over London Bridge was previously effected by the 'subway' above the Tower. Among other means of communication between the opposite banks, in addition to the electric railways mentioned below, are a tunnel under the Thames at Poplar, and an important free ferry, available for wheeled vehicles, at Woolwich, both due to the County Council. Now there are a score of bridges to span the river, some (e.g., Waterloo, Westminster, and Putney) much admired for architectural and engineering properties. Formerly the great thoroughfare to Westminster besides the 'water way' was by Fleet Street and the Strand, also leading to Piccadilly, Kensington, and Hammersmith, but now a grand river-boulevard connects the Houses of Parliament directly with the City by the Victoria Embankment. This handsome quay has reclaimed 37 ac. from the Thames, and supplied room for the Metropolitan District Railway, which runs beneath. The more ancient thoroughfare parallel to the river was the Roman way, which passed from Essex along Whitechapel Road, Cheapside, Holborn, Oxford Street, Bayswater Road, &c., to Brentford and Staines; whence in more modern times a branch diverged at Shepherd's Bush to go to Uxbridge and Oxford. The other thoroughfares, some due to the recent improvements, are numerous, and many of them spacious and handsome. The railway system of London has also a large share in the communication between place and place. There are fifteen termini of the great companies, especially the Great Northern at King's Cross, the Midland at St. Pancras, the North-Western, Euston Square, the Great-Western at Paddington, the Chatham and Dover at Victoria, the South-Western at Waterloo, the South-Eastern at Charing Cross and Cannon Street, the Brighton at London Bridge and Victoria, the Great-Eastern at Liverpool Street, the North-London, Broad Street, the Tilbury, &c., at Fenchurch Street. To connect the termini and supply other communications, the Underground Railway renders enormous service. Its 'Inner Circle,' of 13 m. circumference, connects the City with Notting Hill, South Kensington, and Westminster; and by a second arc includes Westbourne Park, Hammersmith, and Earl's Court, &c. The 'Outer Circle' passes round by Willesden, Hampstead, and Islington. An electric railway now connects the City with Stockwell, going under the Thames and passing Kennington and the Oval, with proposed extension to Clapham and Wandsworth. Another, also passing under the river channel, is now (1895) in course of construction between Waterloo terminus and the city. The General Omnibus Company carries over 50,000,000 persons yearly; 'licensed carriages' amount to 15,000 nearly, including 7500 hansom cabs.

Popular education in London was quite insufficient before the Act of 1870. The great schools are the City of London School, founded 1442; St. Paul's (founded 1512); Westminster (1560), with eight exhibitions to Oxford; Christ's Hospital, 'the Blue Coats' (1533), with income of over £60,000; Merchant Taylors' (1561), now occupying the old Charterhouse buildings [Godalming]; Gresham College (1597); Charterhouse (1611). For the higher education there is the University of London (founded 1836), an examining body with powers to confer degrees in Literature, Law, Philosophy, and Science. University College and King's College (both founded 1828), the former undenominational, the latter connected with the Church of England, supply instruction in such higher branches of education as are taught in the Universities. Recently it has been proposed to establish a teaching University of London. The Inns of Court provide lectures for students of law; and for all branches of medical and surgical science there are many eminent schools, such as the Royal College of Physicians and that of Surgeons, the great hospitals, the Royal Veterinary College. For technical education, an Institute in the City has founded four colleges (in Exhibition Road, in Finsbury, in Kennington, and in Bethnal Green) for engineering, chemistry, applied arts, trades, &c. Among other scientific and higher schools are the Royal School of Mines, the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, the Royal Naval College, Greenwich, the Royal Academy of Painters, &c. A School of Economics and Political Science is to be opened in Oct. 1895. The London School Board have now over 678,000 children 'upon the roll,' whereas before 1870 there were only 170,000 taught throughout the capital.

The capital is now fairly well provided with libraries, since, in addition to those of learned societies and religious bodies, over 30 parishes have adopted the Act for providing public libraries. The following are already open: Battersea, (1) Central, (2) Lammas Hall, (3) Lurline Gardens (S.[1]); Bermondsey (Spa Road) (S.); Bethnal Green; Bishopsgate Institute; Camberwell, (1) Central, (2) Livesey, Old Kent Road, (3) Minet, (4) Dulwich; Chelsea (Manresa Road) (S.); Christ Church (Blackfriars Road); City of London (Moorfields); Clapham (North Side); Clerkenwell; Fulham; Guildhall (the City); Hammersmith (Ravenscourt Park) (S.); Hampstead (S.); Highgate Hill; Holborn (John Street); Kensal Town (Harrow Road) (S.); Kensington, (1) Central, (2) Ladbroke Grove, (3) Brompton; Lambeth, (1) W. Norwood (Knight's Hill Road) (S.), (2) Tate (Lambeth Road) (S.), (3) Durning (Kennington Cross) (S.), (4) Noble (Waterloo Road) (S.), (5) Minet (also under Camberwell); Marylebone, (1) Lisson Grove (S.), (2) E. Marylebone (Mortimer Street); N. Islington, (1) Holloway Road, (2) Duncombe Road, (3) Seven Sisters Road; People's Palace (Mile End Road) (S.); Poplar; Putney; Rotherhithe; St. George's (Buckingham Palace Road); St. Giles' (Southampton Row); St. Martins-in-the-Fields (St. Martins Lane); St. Pancras (Camden Street); Shoreditch (Kingsland Road); S. London (Camberwell Road); Stoke Newington; Streatham; Wandsworth; West Ham, (1) Broadway, Stratford, (2) Barking Road; Westminster, (1) Great Smith Street, (2) Knightsbridge; Whitechapel (High Street) (S). Besides these the following have adopted the Acts: Bromley, Lewisham, Newington (Surrey), St. Giles. It is unnecessary to enumerate the places of amusement in London. The first theatres date from 1582, and because the Lord Mayor objected to have any playhouses within the City, the 'Theatre' and the 'Curtain' were in Shoreditch, the 'Globe,' 'Rose,' and 'Hope' on the Bankside, Surrey.

The drainage system of London is a colossal work occupying from 1859 to 1865 in construction, and cost nearly six millions. Before 1848 the sewerage was very defective. The Fleet R. had for ages served as a main drain, and was not bridged over till 1637, and then only partially. During the first half of this century house-sewerage passed into cess-pools, most of which were unprovided with overflow drains. The former high mortality, as compared with modern results, was due largely to the insanitary state of houses and streets; thus, taking the four worst years of the 17th century, 1603, 1625, 1636, and 1665, the average annual number who died of 'plague' was 37,700 out of 54,200 deaths for all London; and in 1849, 14,125 died of cholera out of 68,800. The death-rate has in recent years been steadily diminishing from 24.3 per 1000 in 1855, to 21.6 in 1881, and 17.3 in 1887, so that London is more healthy than any of the other 20 largest towns in England. The death-rate of all England is 20 per 1000, and France 22.8.

Besides a large number of minor parks, gardens, and recreation grounds throughout London, the following principal parks and open spaces, with an area of over 50 ac. each, are here named in alphabetical order. The name in brackets shows under whose management the property lies. Barnes Common, 100 ac. (the Conservators); Battersea Park, 190 ac. (L. C. C.[1]); Blackheath, 270 ac. (L. C. C.); Brockwell Park, 78 ac. (L. C. C.); Bushey Park, 1000 ac. (O. W.[2]); Clapham Common, 220 ac. (L. C. C.); Clissold Park, 53 ac. (L. C. C.); Dulwich Park, 72 ac. (L. C. C.); Epping Forest, 5348 ac. (the City); Finsbury Park, 118 ac. (L. C. C.); Green Park, 56 ac. (O. W.); Greenwich Park, 185 ac. (O. W.); Hackney Marsh, 340 ac. (L. C. C.); Hampstead Heath and Parliament Hill, 505 ac. (L. C. C.); Highgate Wood, 70 ac. (the City); Hyde Park, 380 ac. (O. W.); Kensington Gardens, 270 ac. (O. W.); Kew Gardens and Arboretum, 240 ac. (O. W.); Peckham Rye, 112 ac. (L. C. C.); Plumstead Common, 110 ac. (L. C. C.); Putney Heath, 400 ac. (the Conservators); Regent's Park, 470 ac. (O. W.); Richmond Park, 2250 ac. (O. W.); St. James's Park, 90 ac. (O. W.); Southwark Park, 65 ac. (L. C. C.); Streatham Common, 66 ac. (L. C. C.); Tooting Bec Common, 144 ac. (L. C. C.); Victoria Park, 300 ac. (L. C. C.); Wandsworth Common, 183 ac. (L. C. C.); Wanstead Park, 182 ac. (City); West Ham Park, 80 ac. (City Corporation and others); Wimbledon Common, 700 ac. (the Conservators); Wormwood Scrubs, 194 ac. (L. C. C.).

The food supply naturally gives rise to many important markets. The chief are the cattle markets of Copenhagen Fields (Holloway) and Deptford, occupying 20 ac. and 22 ac. respectively; the central meat market, Smithfield, 625 ft. by 240 ft., with another for poultry, &c., adjoining; the Leadenhall market for poultry and game (once the principal provision market in the city), rebuilt in 1881; Billingsgate, the great fish market, formerly a harbour for the river craft, extended in 1877 to an area of 39,000 ft., but still quite inadequate; Covent Garden, for vegetables, fruit, and flowers, named from a convent on the site belonging to Westminster Abbey; there are minor vegetable markets at the Borough, Spitalfields, &c. Over many large districts the lack of markets is made up by 'costermongers' selling vegetables, fish, &c., in the streets. The leather market is in Bermondsey; hay markets at Smithfield, Whitechapel, and the 'Cumberland Market'; Tattersall's, Knightsbridge, is the great market for riding and carriage horses.

The port of London extends for 50 m. from the Bridge to the Nore, where it is 10 m. broad, though only half a mile broad at Gravesend. The upper part of the port to the W. of Limehouse is known as the Pool, nearly 2½ m. long. The Thames docks occupy 2267 ac., 330 of which are on the right bank. Those on the left bank are the London, St. Catherine's, E. and W. Indian, Victoria and Albert, Millwall, and Tilbury —the last having the largest area. Vessels of 800 tons reach St. Catherine's Dock beside the Tower, and the largest ascend to Deptford. See also Thames. Even in the Roman and Saxon periods London had such trade that Bede called it 'the market of many nations.' In 1250 the settlement of the Hansa merchants in the 'Steel-yard' greatly increased the commerce with the Continent and the Levant. The value of wool and cloth exported in 1566 to Antwerp and Bruges was over £2,000,000. At that date Gresham founded the Royal Exchange; and the Turkey Company (founded 1579), the E. India Company (1600), the Virginia Company (1606), and the Hudson's Bay Company (1670), largely assisted the growth of the London trade and of British commerce. The following shows the movement of tonnage of the vessels which entered and cleared the port of London at the dates given :—

Year.	Tonnage.		Year.	Tonnage.
	Entered.	Cleared.		Entered.	Cleared.
1693	117,400	104,700	1841	1,596,500	1,124,800
1750	511,700	179,900	1851	2,627,300	2,030,400
1790	581,100	348,100	1861	3,938,100	2,641,700
1816	804,500	681,300	1871	5,135,200	4,029,900
1821	888,400	727,000	1881	5,810,000	4,479,000
1831	1,047,900	928,700	1891	7,638,000	5,788,000

The number of vessels entered has increased from 4416 in 1816 to 10,218 in 1891, and those cleared from 3604 to 7648. Of the total foreign trade of the United Kingdom, 28 per cent. is in the Thames, the great bulk of which is from imports. Thus the yearly Customs' revenue for London is from £10,600,000 to £10,900,000, or more than four times that of Liverpool. The value of those imports (1891) was £144,000,000, the exports being £90,000,000, more than four times the amount in 1840. London has almost a monopoly of the trade with the E. Indies and China; and of 33,700,000 lbs. of tea exported in 1891 from the United Kingdom, 32,267,000 lbs. went from the Thames. London absorbs nearly all the French trade, as well as the Baltic imports, and those from other Continental countries. Mean temp. (20 yrs.), yr. 50.0° F., Jan. 39.0°, July 63.2°; mean rfall. It stands on a ridge projecting into the river, and is enclosed by walls and bastions, built in 1609, and beyond which large suburbs now extend. It was built in its present form by the 'Irish Society,' or London companies, who colonised and gave name to the county. Previously the town was called Derry, which is still the name of the dioceses, the bishops of which have other seats here; namely, the Anglican diocese of Derry and Raphoe (including portions of the cos. of Antrim, Londonderry, Tyrone, and Donegal), and the Roman Catholic diocese of Derry (comprising all co. Londonderry, part of Donegal, and a large part of Tyrone). A few cannon used in this defence are still on the city walls. Principal buildings, the cathedral, the Roman Catholic cathedral, a diocesan free grammar school or college, founded in 1617, and which, together with Gwyn's school, is munificently endowed; a valuable diocesan and public libraries. There is a monument in honour of the Rev. G. Walker, the defender of the city during the memorable siege which it sustained against the forces of James II. in 1689. L. has flour-mills, distilleries, breweries, tanyards, iron-foundries, and manufactures of shirts and table linen. Trade of the port chiefly with Liverpool and Glasgow. For statistics, see Appendix, p. 13. The harbour is formed by the river, along which there are 5709 ft. of quays, with a depth alongside of 24 ft. at ordinary high water, 16 ft. at low water. Lot, dep., SW. France, traversed from E. to W. by the Lot R., which also forms the E. frontier for 28 m.; formed in 1790 from Quercy, a part of Guienne and Gascony; divided into three arrs.: Cahors (cap.), Figeac, and Gourdon. Surface much diversified; highest in NE. (2560 ft.); lowest in SW. (215 ft.), at the point where Lot R. leaves the dep. The rocks forming the mountainous NE. region are granite, gneiss, and mica-schists; following the line of slope, a narrow band of Lias is found to the W.; next, and occupying the greater part of the dep., is a broad Calcareous plateau (650–1300 ft.) belonging to the Causses. In the SW. are Tertiary deposits, folded into a series of parallel ridges (650–1000 ft.). The dep. is drained entirely to the Gironde, chiefly through the Lot and Dordogne; principal trib. of Lot the Célé (r. bk.). The Dordogne traverses the N. part from E. to W., receiving the Cère and Ouysse (l. bk.). In the SE. are small affluents of the Tarn, and in the SW. of the Garonne. Wheat is the chief cereal; next in order are barley, rye, and maize. About 6 per cent. of the dep. is under vineyards, but the production of wine per acre is below the average. Hemp forms an important crop. Chestnuts are largely grown for food. Forests of oak occur in SE. The principal mineral is iron, worked chiefly in NW. about Souillac, Gourdon, and Salviac; coal is obtained in small quantity. Manufactures unimportant. Area, 2018 sq. m. P. (1891) 253,900. See France, table.

Lot, the ancient Oltis, riv., France, rises in the Lozère Mts., passes Mende, Espalion, and Entraygues (where it becomes navigable), Cahors, Penne, Villeneuve d'Agen, and joins the Garonne near Aiguillon. Length, 300 m.; average width in lower part, 330–500 ft.; area of basin, 4345 sq. m.; volume at low water 500 cubic ft. per second, at ordinary water 3500 cubic ft., at excessive floods 141,300 cubic ft.

Lota, seapt. tn., Chile, in the bay and 20 m. N. Arauco, the centre of Chilean coal-mining, begun here in 1855. Three seams are worked, the first and second each about 3 ft. in thickness, the third, which is the richest, about 5½ ft. thick. The best coal is extracted from beneath the sea at the depth of more than 900 ft. below the sea-bottom. It also carries on glass-making and important copper-smelting, the copper being found in the N. of Chile. Good anchorage. Large vessels anchor close in shore in 5½–6½ fathoms. Depth alongside iron mole 21 ft. low tide. P.<4000.

Lot-et-Garonne, dep., SW. France, traversed from SE. to NW. by the Garonne (which divides it into two unequal portions), and E. to W. by the Lot, which joins the Garonne near centre; formed mainly of parts of Guienne (dists. Agenais and Bazadais), and partly from Gascony (dists. Condomois and Lomagne); divided into four arrs.: Agen (cap.), Marmande, Nérac, and Villeneuve. The surface consists of wide plains (Quaternary), from which low hills (Tertiary) rise abruptly, their slopes covered with orchards and vineyards. Most diversified in NE., where is found the highest point, Côteau de Bélair (895 ft.). The hills separating Garonne and Lot Rivs. have a mean elevation of 650–750 ft. The valleys of Garonne and Lot (respectively 370 and 71 sq. m.) are exceedingly fertile. The SW. is a continuation of the Landes; formerly a waste, it is being reclaimed by plantations of pine and cork. Principal tribs. of Garonne (besides the Lot) are, r. bk., Séoune and Tolzac; l. bk., Gers, Baïse, or Bayse, with its affluent Gélise, and Avance. The Dropt, or Drot, traverses the N. part from E. to W., forming part of the frontier towards Dordogne. The Garonne, classed as navigable throughout the dep., is really so only by its lateral canal. The Lot is navigable by the aid of locks, but on account of its feeble current is of little use; the Dropt, also with locks, is navigable below Eymet. The soil is highly cultivated; chief cereal, wheat, then maize (area under which is about one-fourth that of wheat) and barley. The vine covers nearly 8 per cent. of the surface, but the production per acre is below the average; other important cultures are hemp and mulberry leaves. With the exception of iron, of which considerable deposits occur, minerals are of little importance. Area, 2079 sq. m. P. (1891) 295,400. See France, table.

Louisiade Archipelago, group of isls., Pacific Ocean, between 10° and 12° S., 151½° and 154½° E., SE. of New Guinea and the d'Entrecasteaux group. Chief islands Tagula, or Sudest, the largest, 45 m. long by 4–5 m. wide, Rossel, the easternmost, Pana-tinani, or Joannet (adjoining Tagula on the NW.), Misima, or St. Aignan, the furthest NW. of the larger islands. The southern islands are surrounded by a barrier reef from which Misima is free. Patches of alluvial gold on Tagula and Misima. Islands mostly sparsely inhabited, except Misima, which has a population of about 4000. People partly of pure or modified Papuan, partly of Malayan type. See Proc. R. G. S., 1889, pp. 529–34, 540, and map (1 : 1,700,000), p. 580.

Louisiana, one of the U.S., nearly equal to England in area, lying about the mouth of the Mississippi, with a coast-line on the Gulf of Mexico of 1250 m. Cap. Baton Rouge; other towns, New Orleans, Shreveport, and Lake Charles. The surface consists mainly of a great plain, average elevations 75 ft.; highest in the N., and sloping S. and SE. to the delta of the Mississippi, which forms about one-third of the state. Coast much indented; principal inlets, Lakes Pontchartrain and Borgne, E.; and Bays Barrataria, Timbalier, Atchafalaya, and Lakes Arthur, Calcasieu, and Sabine, W. of Mississippi R. The coast-belt, a marshy region, liable to inundation, but interspersed with cultivable tracts and oak groves, extends inland for 30 m.; here rice and sugar are cultivated, as also in the rich bottom-lands of the Mississippi Valley, 20–60 m. wide. In the SW. of the state, N. of the coast-belt, are rich and well-watered prairies; inland are the upland prairies, where corn and cotton are cultivated. Principal rivers, Mississippi, which forms the E. boundary for 450 m., and flows through the state for 150 m.; its l. bk. trib., Red R., with Ouachita and Little Rivs., and Sabine, on W. frontier. Most of the rivers are navigable; total length of inland navigation over 3700 m. Dykes, or levees, 5–20 ft. high, and with a total length of 1100 m., border the lower courses of the rivers to protect the surrounding country from inundation. Forests, in which the yellow pine predominates, cover a great part of the state. The geological formations belong to the Tertiary and Quaternary periods; the latter are widely distributed in the S., and extend into the valleys of the Mississippi and Red Rivs.; the former cover the rest of the state. Climate, semi-tropical, unhealthy in the lowlands. Rainfall everywhere abundant, decreasing inland [Port Eads, New Orleans, Shreveport]. The soil, except in the N., is exceeding fertile; sugar, cotton, and rice are the staple agricultural products. The divs. corresponding to counties in other states are here called 'parishes.' L. was visited in 1542 by some members of De Soto's expedition, and in the following century by La Salle, who named it in honour of Louis XIV., the name being at first applied to an extensive region on both sides of the Mississippi. The first settlement in this wider L. was formed by the French under Iberville in 1700 (at Biloxi, now in Mississippi state), the first settlement in the present state (which dates as such from 1812) on the site of New Orleans in 1718. From 1762 to 1800 the whole region belonged to Spain. In the part of the state S. of the Red R. there are still considerable numbers of descendants of French settlers, those E. of the Bayou Bœuf (or Têche), mainly creoles or descendants of the original French (or French and Spanish) settlers, those W. of that channel mainly descendants of immigrants expelled by the British from Nova Scotia in 1755, and locally known as Acadians. Area, 48,720 sq. m. P. 1,118,600. See United States, table. [E. J. H.]

Louisville, city, U.S., Kentucky, Jefferson co., on the l. bk. of the Ohio, with a river frontage of 6 m. at its falls, 95 m. SW. Cincinnati. A short canal has been formed by which steamers avoid the falls or rapids. Its position on the great highway between the N. and S. gives it great advantages as a distributing point. As a leaf tobacco market L. leads the world, and it has also important live stock markets. Numerous manufactures of oak-tanned sole leather, pork-packing, and iron are other leading industries. It is one of the great centres for medical education. Alt. 438 ft. (R.R.); signal station 530 ft. (U.S. Signal Office). Mean temp., 57.0° F., Jan. 35.2°, July 78.9°; rfall. (12 yrs.), 49.04 in. P. Louvain (Flemish Leuven, German Löwen), a city of Belgium, prov. Brabant, cap. arr., on the Dyle, 14 m. E. by N. Brussels. Its old ramparts, which were 7 m. in circumference, are now converted into planted walks. Principal edifices, a town hall, one of the richest and most ornamental in Belgium, church of St. Peter, citadel, and buildings of the musical academy. The university of Louvain, founded in 1426, was suppressed in 1835, and replaced by a Roman Catholic college, which has a library, botanic garden, and an anatomical museum attached to it. In the Middle Ages Louvain was the seat of extensive woollen and linen manufactures, and it still has some manufactures of lace, hosiery, chemical products, besides tanneries and distilleries, &c.; but its trade is chiefly in beer. It is connected by a canal with the Rupel R., and thus with Antwerp, and has a large dock, has 1182 ft. of quayage, and a depth of 10.8 ft. P. (1866) 32,976; (1873) 32,314; (1890) 40,600.

Lozère, dep., S. France, formed of parts of Languedoc, mainly Gévaudan; divided into three arrs.: Mende (cap.), Florac, and Marvejols. The most mountainous dep., called 'the roof of France,' comprises three distinct parts, the Cevennes, E.; Montagne, N. and NW.; and Causses, SW. The Cevennes in the dep. comprise several ranges: Aigoual in the SE., SW., and NE., from which is given off a spur, the Bougès, running W.; northward the Aigoual is connected near the Col St. Maurice with the Lozère Mts., a porphyritic range running E. and W., with Pic Finiels (5585 ft.), the highest summit in the dep. Further N. is another parallel spur, the Goulet Mts., highest point Signal de Goulet (4920 ft.). The Cevennes are connected with the Montagne in the N. by the plains of Montbel, and a wild granitic plateau called 'Palais du Roi.' The Montagne comprises the Margeride or Margerite Mts., a series of undulating granitic plateaux, part covered with forest and part under grass, affording pasturage for large flocks of sheep; highest summit, Signal de Randon (5100 ft.). In the extreme W. of the dep., and connected with the Margeride Mts. by wide plateaux, are the mountains of Aubrac, with well-wooded valleys and rich pasture lands, where cattle are extensively reared; highest summit, Signal de Mailhebiau (4825 ft.), to the N. of which are many small lakes and ponds. The Causses in the SW. cover an area of 485 sq. m., and are very thinly peopled. The dep. receives no rivers, but gives rise to more than 400 torrents, whose waters go to the Garonne, the Loire, and the Rhone. The Tarn rises in the E. and flows SW., receiving on l. bk. Tarnon and Jonte; the Lot flows W., receiving on r. bk. Colagne; the Allier flows mainly on NE. frontier. The soil is fertile only in the valleys of the S. and SE. Rye is the principal cereal, then oats and wheat. Chestnuts form an important article of food. Minerals include argentiferous lead at Villefort and Vialas; lithographic stone is found in the Sauveterre, and there are quarries of marble, granite, and slate. L. was the scene of many events connected with the Camisard war. Area, 1996 sq. m. P. (1891) 135,500. See France, table.

Lucca, walled city, Italy, Tuscany, on the Serchio, 11 m. NE. by N. Pisa, cap. prov. L. Its cathedral contains valuable paintings and antiquities; numerous churches, mostly built of Carrara marble; a ducal palace; many educational establishments, including a seminary for noble ladies, founded by the sister of Napoleon I.; an aqueduct on 459 arches, for the conveyance of water from Monte Pisano. It is the first place in Italy where silk was manufactured; it still has manufactures of silk, and the spun silk which it now produces has the reputation of being the best in Italy. It also carries on the spinning and weaving of jute, hemp, and linen, and the spinning of cotton, and produces also inlaid work, sculptured marble, and cigars. The water-power of the Serchio and tributary torrents is largely made use of in the mills. In the 12th century it became a free city. In 1805 Napoleon I. erected it into a principality for his sister's husband, Bacciochi, and it was annexed to the kingdom of Italy in 1860. Near it are the reputed baths of Nero, and 11 m. northward, in the valley of the Serchio, are the baths of L., a favourite summer watering-place. P. (1871) 21,300; (1881) 20,400.

Lucerne (from lucerna, 'lighthouse'), city, Switzd., cap. cant. L., on the Reuss, at the outlet of the Lake of L., 13 m. SW. Zug, with but little industry; a favourite tourist-resort; has four bridges, of which two are covered and adorned with ancient paintings. The lion of L. is a colossal figure of a dying lion by Thorwaldsen, in memory of the heroic resistance of the Swiss to the Paris mob at the Tuileries, 1792. Adjoining this monument is the 'glacier garden,' an area of ice-marked rocks with numerous potholes, the largest 26 ft. wide by 30 ft. deep. A rope railway ascends Mount Pilatus from L. Alt. 1490 ft. Rfall. (13 yrs.) 48.05 in. P. (comm.) 20,600.

Lucerne, Lake of (Ger. Vierwaldstättersee, or the 'Lake of Four Forest Cantons'), lake, Switzd., near its centre, enclosed by the cantons Schwiz, Uri, Unterwalden, and Lucerne. Shape cruciform, with a prolongation eastward, called the Bay of Uri, where its banks rise into wild sublimity; its scenery is everywhere picturesque. The Reuss enters it at its SE., and leaves it at its NW. end. Length, 24 m.; breadth, ½ m. to 2 m.; area, 44½ sq. m.; alt. 1435 ft.; greatest depth, 700 ft. (SSW. of Gersau). The lake is very seldom completely frozen over. Navigation sometimes dangerous, especially in sudden outbursts of the föhn (q.v.).

Lucerne, Ger. Luzern, canton, Switzd., near its centre, enclosed by the cantons Schwiz, Unterwalden, Zug, Aargau, Solothurn (Soleure), and Bern. Surface mountainous in the S., elevation of hills decreasing towards the N., with wide intervening valleys. Climate temperate; soil generally fertile. Principal towns L. (the cap.) and Russwil. Principal rivers the Reuss and its trib., the Emmen, and the Wigger, which flows to the Aar. The canton comprises the lakes Sempach and Baldegg; those of L. and Zug form part of its E. limits. Fruits are plentiful, and wine is made; but the chief branches of industry are cattle-rearing, for which the valley of Entlebuch is specially noted, and dairy husbandry; workable beds of iron ore at Rothhorn, Pilatus; coal in Entlebuch and near L. Manufactures mostly domestic. L. is the chief of the Swiss Roman Catholic cants. Area, 580 sq. m. P. 136,000. See Switzerland, table.

Lunda, large terr., central Africa, situated between 6° and 12° S. and 18° and 24° E. Consists of widely extending plains, sloping gradually towards the middle Congo regions. Principal rivers, the Kasai, Lulua, Lubilash, and their tribs. L. is inhabited by the Kalunda or Balunda, a large Bantu tribe. The ruler of L. has the hereditary title of Muata Yamvo, and his influence extends not only over the Kalunda, but also over many of the surrounding Bantu tribes, who have to pay tribute and to assist the Muata Yamvo in case of war. The existence of this great 'Lunda Empire,' as it was called, was known to Europeans as far back as the 16th century, but it remained unexplored until quite recently. It has some very peculiar political institutions. The supreme power is not exclusively in the hands of the Muata Yamvo, but is shared by an unmarried woman, called the Lukokesha. Both of these are elected by four members of the nobility of the country. The cap. is called Mussumba, and its site is changed whenever a Muata Yamvo dies. By the political division of Africa the Lunda terrs. belong partly to the Congo Free State and partly to the Portuguese sphere of influence, the Kasai forming the boundary between the two. Area uncertain. P. estimated at 2,000,000. [H. G. S.]

Luxembourg, prov., Belgium, in the SE., forms the W. part of the old grand-duchy. It is traversed by several branches of the Ardennes Mts., known in this region as the Hautes Fagnes, is well wooded, with remains of the ancient forest of Ardennes, of melancholy appearance, and not fertile soil, and has many marshes. Part of the N. slope of the Ardennes forms an undulating plateau called Famenne. Principal minerals, iron, lead, marble, slate, and whetstone. It is divided into the arrs. Arlon (the cap.), Neufchâteau, and Marche-en-Famene. The majority of the inhabitants speak Walloon (French). Area, 1706 sq. m. P. (1870) 204,326; (1873) estimated at 206,060; (1890) 212,000.

Luxemburg, in French spelling Luxembourg (in the 10th century Lusilinburch, even in modern German sometimes called Lützelburg, 'little castle,' the first part of the name from Old High German, lusil, 'little'), tn., gd.-duchy of L., on the Alzet, 25 m. WSW. Trèves. It stands partly on a rocky height and partly in the plain below, the lower town in the valley of the Alzet, which is crossed by four large viaducts, communicating by flights of steps and zigzag streets, impassable by carriages. By the Treaty of London, 1867, the fortifications were dismantled; these were in great part excavated in the solid rock. It has a public library and small museum, and important manufactures of leather gloves, also of woollens, linens, and cottons, breweries, and trade in iron. L., a fortified post from the time of Otho the Great, was several times captured, last by the French in 1795, and made cap. dep. Des Forêts. Alt. 1020 ft. Mean temp., yr. 47.7° F., Jan. 34.2°, July 63.5°. P. 18,000.

Luxemburg, Grand Duchy of, state, Europe, bounded E. and NE. by Rhenish Prussia, from which it is separated by the Moselle, Sauer, and Our, S. by Alsace-Lorraine, and W. by the Belgian prov. of Luxembourg. It was erected into a gd.-duchy under the King of the Netherlands in 1814, when it included Belgian L., but was dismembered by the revolution in 1830, and in 1839 divided between Belgium and the Netherlands. In 1867 the portion which retains the designation of grand-duchy of L., and of which the King of Holland was grand-duke, was declared neutral terr. by the Treaty of London. It has belonged, however, since 1842 to the German Customs' Union (Zollverein). Surface hilly, in the N. and W. mostly above 1000 ft. in elevation. Chief river, besides those on the E. frontier, the Alzette, which flows N. into the Sauer. Chief cereals, barley and oats. Some excellent wines are grown on the slopes overlooking the Moselle and elsewhere. Enormous deposits of iron ore are worked, principally round Esch, near the S. frontier, the annual production being between two and three million tons. The minerals also include lead, antimony, and copper, besides a fine kind of gypsum (alabaster). The language in most parts of the state is a dialect of Low German, but Walloon (French) is spoken in a few villages, and both French and German are employed as administrative languages. Cap. L. In 1890, on the death of William III., King of the Netherlands, the grand-duchy passed to the Walram or elder branch of the house of Nassau. Area, 999 sq. m. P. (1871) 197,500; (1890) 211,100.

Lyonnais, an old prov. of France, cap. Lyons, now forming deps. Rhône and Loire.

Lyons, eccles. par., Eng., Durham, Pittington and Houghton-le-Spring par. P.<4500.

Lyons, in French Lyon, the ancient Lugdunum, city, France, cap. dep. Rhône, on the Rhone and Saône, which unite below the city, in 45° 45′ 44″ N., 4° 49′ 34″ E., by rail 218 m. SSE. Paris, 218 m. N. by W. Marseilles. It occupies an admirable situation at the meeting-place of roads and railways from the N. (Dijon, Besançon), NE. (Geneva), E. (Chambéry and Turin by the Mont Cenis tunnel), NW. (Roanne), SW. (St. Étienne, whence it is supplied with coal), and S. (the Rhone valley). It consists of the city proper, between the rivers on a peninsula, the length of which was extended southwards in 1770 by the sculptor Perrache, and numerous suburbs on the l. bk. of the Rhone and the r. bk. of the Saône, surrounded by gardens and vineyards. It is the seat of a national court, and of a university academy for the deps. Rhone, Loire, and Aix; a school of medicine (on the l. bk. of the Rhône), the finest and best managed in France; the seat of an archbishop, bearing the title of 'Primate of all the Gauls;' the residence of many foreign consuls; and has a chamber of commerce, a mint, a national college, seminary, and a library of 130,000 volumes, museum, botanic garden, school of design, and a national veterinary school. Two of its collections are unique in France—the museum of arts and industry in the Palais de la Bourse (exchange), and the museum of religions, or Musée Guimet. The cathedral of L., built between the 12th and 15th centuries, is a mixture of Romanesque and Gothic architecture, with traces of oriental influence. L., the second city of France in regard to population and commercial importance, is a fortified town, having fortifications extending in a circle of 13 m. on the heights. It has manufactures of all kinds, the most important being the silk industry in all its branches, including the manufacture of silk hats and silk gloves, but especially silk-weaving, L. being the most important centre of this industry in the western world. It is still largely a domestic industry, but the small weavers have suffered greatly of late years by the growing competition of great factories. It is hoped, however, that this department of the industry of the city will be aided by the carrying out of a scheme for which powers were obtained from the French Parliament in July 1892, for obtaining water-power from the Rhone above L. for the production of electro-motive force to be distributed to small factories. Already the water-power of the Rhone, which is here a rapid river, is largely employed in the L. industries, which, besides the silk manufactures, include the manufacture of machinery, and various articles in iron, copper, and bronze, the manufacture of leather, starch, besides jewelry, &c. Chief trade in its own manufactures, the arms and ribbons of St. Étienne, and wines. L. was founded by the Pro-Consul Munatius Plancus B.C. 43, and became the cap. of Celtic Gaul, or the Lyonnaise. Destroyed by fire, it was rebuilt by Nero. Severus ruined it A.D. 197, but it was restored by Constantine. It was the residence of the kings of Burgundy till the end of the 5th century, and was ravaged by the Saracens in the 8th century; afterwards governed by its archbishops, feudatories of the German Empire; it was annexed to France in 1312. In 1793 it was taken by the army of the Convention after a two months' siege, and was the scene of the most horrid cruelties. Birthplace of Germanicus, the Emperors Claudius, M. Aurelius, and Caracalla; of the botanist Jussieu, the inventor Jacquard, and Camille Jourdan. Alt. 637 ft. Mean temp., yr. 52.9° F., Jan. 35.8°, July 70.8°. P. (1872) 302,000; (1891) 438,100.

Macao, seapt. tn., China, prov. Kwangtung, on the Canton R., on a peninsula on an island of the same name, 38 m. W. by S. Victoria (Hong-kong). The peninsula, 2½ m. in length by less than a mile in breadth, is connected with the island by a narrow, low, and sandy isthmus, forming a land-locked inner harbour 12 m. in circuit. The town stands on declivities between this harbour and the outer anchorage, and is surrounded by hills crowned by several forts; it is divided into two distinct parts, the Portuguese and Chinese. At the end of the town is a mansion and picturesque garden, with the 'Grotto' where Camoens composed a great deal of his 'Lusiad' (1559–60). Both harbours are within the region of typhoons, and suffer greatly from them; the roadstead, badly sheltered, is bounded on the N. by Hiang-shan and by nine small rocky islands, S. by another group of islands, the principal of which form a small port, preferred by many vessels to the large roadstead, which is too open and exposed; it has but little depth near the town, so that large vessels anchor 5 or 6 m. from M. The trade (much of which is contraband) is mainly carried on in junks by Chinese merchants. It is chiefly in rice, tea, silk, sugar, and indigo, and principally with Canton, Hong-kong, Batavia, and Goa. Salt is brought from Cochin China. The Portuguese authorities and others form a senate, a governor, and council, but the government of the native inhabitants is substantially vested in a Chinese mandarin. M. was granted to the Portuguese, subject to an annual rent, by the Chinese emperor in 1586, in return for assistance against pirates. In 1863 the payment of this tribute was rescinded, and the land conceded by treaty to Portugal, but jurisdiction over the Chinese inhabitants retained. Mackenzie, large riv., in the Canadian NW. Terr., issues from the W. end of the Great Slave Lake, flows mostly NW., and after a course estimated at 1100 m. enters the Arctic Ocean by an intricated delta between 134° and 136° W. Principal affluents, Liard, or Mountain R., Peel R., and Bear R., from Great Bear Lake. Forts Simpson, Norman, and Good Hope are on its banks. It was discovered and first navigated by Alexander Mackenzie in 1789. An extensive deposit of lignite accompanies its course and its estuary westward. Several rapids occur in its course, but a light-draught steamer now navigates the river throughout, the first impassable barrier from the sea occurring on the Great Slave R. (feeder of the Great Slave Lake) in 60° N., about 1360 m. from the Arctic Ocean. The valley of the Mackenzie R. is reported to be remarkably fertile.

Madagascar (meaning and origin of name unknown), large isl., in the Indian Ocean, separated from Africa by the deep Mozambique Channel, and situated between 11° 58′ and 25° 40′ S. lat., and 43° 16′ and 50° 28′ E. In point of size M. is the third island of the globe. It is a mountainous island, the interior consisting of a number of mountain ranges, isolated mountains, and plateaux, the latter sloping in terraces to the Indian Ocean. The eastern slopes are steeper than the western, the south-eastern parts having a very abrupt slope of more than 2500 ft. to the coast region. A number of large plains extend in the interior between the mountain groups. Granite and gneiss form the central parts of the mountain systems of M.; they are surrounded in the W., S., and SE. by Mesozoic and Tertiary limestone and sandstone rocks. Volcanic rocks occur in many parts of M., especially in the central, eastern, and northern terrs. [Amber], and in all probability a succession of extinct volcanoes traverses the northern half of M. from the Radama Is. to the highest mountains in the centre of M., the Ankaratra Mts. (8900 ft.), which are themselves of volcanic origin. The northern coasts are much indented, the numerous bays forming harbours and roadsteads (Antongil, Antomboka, Ambaro, Narinda, Mahajamba, Bombetoke, and others), while the S. coasts are flat and monotonous, and have but few harbours. Many parts of the coasts are surrounded by coral reefs. An important feature of the E. coast is a line of lagoons stretching in almost unbroken line for about 300 m. within a few hundred yards of the shore S. of Tamatave. The principal rivers, the Mangoka, or St. Vincent, the largest of all, Betsiboka, Manambolo, Mania, and Onilahy, flow more or less W., in accordance with the general slope. Of lakes must be mentioned the Alaotra, Itasi, Kinkuni, and Andranomena. As regards climate, the coast regions are hot and unhealthy, whilst the higher parts of the interior are more moderate and less injurious. The SE. trade wind blows from April to November, and as a consequence the rainfall is much more copious in the eastern than in the western parts of the island, viz., from 50–80 in. annual rainfall on the E. coast, and from 10–25 in. on the W. coast. For the interior, see Antananarivo. The flora and fauna of M. form a link between Africa and Asia, and are remarkable on account of a number of peculiar species of plants and animals. The vegetation is one of the most luxuriant on the globe. The whole coast, lined with a tropical forest-region and similar forests, cover many parts of the northern half of the island, whilst the southern plateaux are characterised by widely extending savannas. Baobabs, Ravenala bananas, Chrysopias, Raphia and Areca palms, Pandanus, orchids, acacias, ebony, coco-nut, orange, and mulberry trees are characteristic features of this luxuriant vegetation. Cotton, hemp, rice, coffee, tobacco, sugar-cane, and potatoes are grown in various parts of the island, but the cultivation of cereals is limited. Pastoral pursuits, especially cattle-rearing and pig and sheep breeding, are of considerable importance. Very little is at present known about the minerals of M., as it is strictly prohibited by the laws of the Hova to explore the island for this purpose. We know, however, that iron ores are abundant, especially in the central parts, and that gold, silver, copper, rock-salt, sulphur, plumbago, and nitre have been found; and it is probable that coalfields exist in the northern parts of the island. The commerce of M. is but little developed, on account of the absence of means of communication. It is principally in the hands of English, French, American, and German merchants. The chief exports are hides, tallow, wax, caoutchouc, cattle, pigs, and salt; the principal imports are textiles, glass beads, pottery, glass, ironware, wine, rum, and horses. The annual imports and exports each amount to about 4,000,000 francs. The population of M. consists of two totally different ethnological elements, the first being of Malayan, the second of African origin. The former is represented by the reigning race of the island, the light-coloured Hova, as well as by the Betsileo and Betsimaraka, whilst the dark brown, or black Sakalava and various similar tribes, are Africans of the Negroid type. Mixtures of the two races are of frequent occurrence, e.g., the Taimoro, Taifasi, Tanosi, and various other tribes. Whether the interesting Kimo, who are said to inhabit the western forests of M., are autochthonic pygmy tribes similar to those of central Africa is at present impossible to decide. A number of Suahelis, Hindus, and Arabs have settlements on the coasts. The Hova kingdom is under despotic rule, and although European influence has produced a sort of semi-civilisation, yet the administration is entirely free from European elements. With the exception of the cap., Antananarivo (population estimated at 80,000, by some travellers at 150,000), M. has no towns of importance; the principal ports are Tamatave and Mojanga. It is beyond doubt that the ancients and early Arabs had some knowledge of this extensive island. Marco Polo, however, was the first who described it in detail. In 1642 M. was declared a French possession, but although the French occupied some coast places and neighbouring islands, yet they have never been in possession of any important part of M., and all their efforts in this respect have been futile. Even a treaty concluded in 1885, by which some political rights were granted to France, has but slightly increased the actual influence of the French, their present possessions being limited to the islands of St. Marie and Nossi Bé, to some places near the Antomboka and Bali Bays, and to four ports on the E. coast. Many parts of the island are still unexplored, especially in the W. and S. Area, 228,340 sq. m. Population estimated at 3–4,000,000. See Proc. R. G. S., 1879, p. 646, &c., and map, p. 688, showing granitic and volcanic areas and forest distribution; 1889, p. 295, &c.; 1892, p. 737, &c. [H. G. S.]

Madeira, principal isl. of a group including also Porto Santo and the Desertas, 338 m. from Africa, 699 m. from Lisbon, 518 m. from the Azores, 276 m. from Tenerife, in 33° N., 17° W. It has the shape of an ellipse (34 m. long W. to E., 15 m. wide, 94 m. in circuit). Very mountainous, with an axial ridge (3000 ft. mean alt., Pico Ruivo, 6060 ft.) forming some high plains (Paúl da Serra), and ending (E.) in a long narrow penin. (Saõ Lourenço), which has the Desertas (SE.) as its continuation. The rocks are mostly eruptive (hypersthenite, basalt, tufa, trachyte, conglomerates). Tertiary and Quaternary deposits have been found. The whole island is still rising. M., famous for its temperate climate, is used as a sanatorium by invalids from Europe and those who have been long resident in Africa (20 yrs., mean temp. 65° F., Jan. 62°, Sept. 74°; mean max. 77°, min. 54°; absolute max. 85°, absolute min. 49⅓°; rfall. 24 in. in 79 days). The dominant winds are N. Sometimes there is snow on the highest mountains, very seldom below 2300 ft. alt. M. is a transitional station between the Mediterranean and African floras (with some American forms), the former predominating Numerous plants have been introduced since the 15th century. Vegetation is denser in the E. and S. than in the W. and N. There are a few endemic animal forms—a seal (Pelagius), a bat, a reptile, some birds, arthropoda, and mollusca. The maritime fauna is distinctly European. M. now produces all tropical and European fruits. Its wines (Malmsey, Sercial, Boal) are famous; sugar-cane and tobacco are cultivated. Some domestic industries (lace, straw). M. is in the commercial road between Europe, W. and S. Africa, America. It is an administrative dist. of Portugal (cap. Funchal). Probably known by the Phœnicians, and visited by the Arabs (12th century). M. was rediscovered and colonised by the Portuguese early in the 15th century. P. (16th century) 16,000; (1825) 100,000; (1878) 129,002; (1890) 132,668. [J. B. R.]

Madeira, or Cayari (the former a Portuguese name meaning 'wood,' and referring to the extensive forests on its banks), riv., S. America, the most important trib. of the Amazon, formed on the frontier of Bolivia and Brazil, in 10° 25′ S., 65° 25′ W., and flows on the whole NE. till it joins the Amazon in 58¾° W., about 100 m. below Manaos. The Mamore, which

's formed by two headwaters, one, the Chimore, rising in the Bolivian Andes to the E. of Cochabamba, and the other, the Guapay or Rio Grande, by much the longer, rising S. of Cochabamba and describing a great curve to the S., flows N., forming below the confluence of the Guapore (r. bk.), the boundary between Bolivia and Brazil, is usually regarded as the main headwater of the M., and the two rivers together would afford a continuous waterway for steamers to within a short distance of Cochabamba were it not for a long series of bad rapids (mainly caused by the presence of hard gneissose and other metamorphic rocks, or of granite, in the bed of the river) occurring on a stretch of more than 200 m. above and below the confluence of the Beni. The first of these rapids ascending is formed by the Falls of Santo Antonio in 8° 48′ S., the highest that of Guajara-mirim in 10° 50′ S. Among the more important intervening rapids are the Caldeirão do Inferno ('hell caldron'), Paredão, and Ribeirão. The total fall of the river between the highest and lowest rapids is 270 ft. The construction of a railway 174 m. long to avoid these rapids has long been projected. Total length (including the Mamore), about 3100; area of basin, 480,500 sq. m. Discharge at upper end of rapids, low water, 53,000 cubic ft. per. second; flood, 429,000 cubic ft. per. second; in lower part of course (Sapucaiaroca), low water, 146,000 cubic ft., flood 1,381,000 cubic ft.; per second.

Madras, city and seapt., Brit. India, the seat of government, and headquarters of the Madras army, the third seaport of India, ranking next after Bombay and Calcutta; lat. of observatory 13° 4′ 6″ N., long. 80° 14′ 50″ E. The municipality includes a number of suburban tracts and villages scattered over a partly cultivated dist. stretching for 9 m. along the coast, and 3½ m. inland. The nucleus of the city, the centre of business, containing the banks, customs-house, mercantile offices, as well as the High Court, is the 'Black Town,' an ill-built, densely peopled block about a mile square. S. of this is a dist. partly surrounded by the circuitous Cooum R. and its backwater, and hence called the 'Island,' containing the fort, Government House, and several handsome public buildings, the whole having an open space seaward. Still further S. is the old Portuguese town of St. Thomé, now an integral part of the city; to the SW. and W. are European quarters, and W. of the 'Black Town,' the Eurasian quarters and other suburbs, containing many European residences in spacious 'compounds.' S. of St. Thomé, and forming the S. limit of the city, the Adyar R., here crossed by the Elphinstone Bridge, flows from W. to E. Amongst the principal buildings are the cathedral, Scotch Kirk, Government House, Senate House, Memorial Hall, Patchcappah's Hall, and Chepák Palace, formerly the residence of the Nawáb of Arcot, now containing the revenue offices. Fort St. George, or the 'White Town,' contains the arsenal, the principal government offices, and St. Mary's, built in 1680, the oldest English church in India. Important institutions are the observatory, founded in 1792, which gives the standard time to all India, and is the fixed point of departure of the Trigonometrical Survey; and the university. The principal recreation grounds are the South Beach Promenade and the People's Park (116 ac.). The drainage of the town is partly to the sea and partly to a sewage farm; in the 'Black Town' a large pumping apparatus is provided to remove the sewage to a distance. The town is supplied with water from two reservoirs fed by the Cortelliar R., the Cholávaram and Red Hills, whence the water is conveyed to the city by a channel 7 m. in length. The annual supply is about 135,000,000 cubic feet. In 1884 the Red Hills reservoir was burst by a cyclone, and for ten days the inhabitants had to depend on tanks and wells. Harbour works have been in progress for many years, but the difficulties of construction are enormous. The main undertaking has been the enclosure of a considerable water area by two converging piers, respectively 3726 ft. and 3907 ft. in length, leaving a passage between of 520 ft. The depth at entrance at ordinary spring tide is, high water 49 ft., low 46 ft.; the corresponding depths within the harbour are 41 ft. and 38 ft. In the centre is an iron pier, opposite the custom-house, 300 yards in length, completed in 1862 at a cost of £110,000. Eleven vessels can be berthed in the harbour; vessels are loaded and discharged by lighters. The roadstead outside affords good anchorage, but is liable to be swept by destructive hurricanes. For railways, see Madras Presidency. The Buckingham Canal passes through the W. outskirts of the city. A grant of the land on which M. now stands was obtained by Mr. Francis Day in 1639, and a factory with fortifications constructed; in 1743 the fort was extended and strengthened, and by that time the city had become the largest in S. India. In 1746 the French, under La Bourdonnais, captured the fort, which was restored two years later; it was again besieged, though unsuccessfully, in 1758. The town of St. Thomé was founded by the Portuguese in 1504, held by the French from 1672 to 1674, and taken by the English in 1749. The average imports of M. exceed £5,000,000, and the exports (principally coffee, cotton, grain, hides, indigo, oil-seeds, &c.) £4,500,000. Mean temp., yr. 82° F., Jan. 76°, June 88°; mean rfall., yr. 49.1 in., July–Dec. 42.5 in., Oct.–Nov. 24.5 in. P. (1871) 397,552; (1881) 405,848; (1891) 452,518.

Madras Presidency, Brit. India, embracing all the eastern plains to the S. of Lake Chilka, nearly the whole range of the Eastern Ghâts, together with a considerable area of the Indian tableland, more particularly a great wedge between the native states of Haidarábád and Mysore, the N. boundary of this area being formed mainly by the Kistna, with its trib. the Tungabhadra, and the whole area to the S. and SW. of Mysore. There are five native states under the control of the Madras government; and the region NE. of the Godávari, forming the Jaipúr (Jeypore) Agency, is under a peculiar administration. There are three French possessions on the E. ct. (Yanaon, Pondicherri, and Karikal), besides one (Mahé) on the W. The presidency is divided into dists., as shown in the following table:—

The terr. comprises three great natural divs., depending on the position and direction of the Eastern and Western Ghâts: the E. ct. region, the W. ct. region, and the central tableland. The three principal rivers are Godávari, Kistna (or Krishna), and Káveri (Cauvery), all of which rise in the Western Ghâts, and flow SE. to Bay of Bengal. In their upper courses they are of little use either for irrigation or navigation, but in the lower, where they form great deltas, they are utilised for both purposes. Among the physical striking features of the terr. are the Nílgiri Hills, the Pálghát Gap, and the Anamalai Hills and Cardamom Mts. to the S. of that gap; the western slopes of the two last ranges belong, however, to the native states of Cochin and Travancore. The plains behind that part of the coast which trends north-eastwards are known historically as the Northern Circars. The coast on the Bay of Bengal to the S. of this is known as the Coromandel coast, probably through a corruption of the name Cholamandalam, that is, 'country of the Cholas,' as the people of this region were at one time called. The SW. coast, on the Arabian Sea, is called the Malabar coast. The climate is hot, but varies considerably in different parts. The heat is intense in the plains of the SE., and the rainfall generally below 50 in., decreasing towards the S. [Masulipatam, Madras (city), Negapatam, Trichinopoli, Madura]. On the W. ct. the summer temperature is high, and the SW. monsoon brings excessive rain [Cochin, Mangalore]. In the Ghâts [Mercara] and in the interior temperature is modified by elevation, the rainfall in the interior being comparatively small [Coimbatore, Wellington]. The rainy season lasts from May to Oct. Irrigation is effected by canals, tanks, and wells; canals are connected mainly with the deltas of the great rivers. Of works in progress, the most important are the Periyar and the Rushikeslia, for the Madura and Ganjam dists. respectively. Irrigation by tanks and wells is also advancing considerably. Three wide-spread famines have occurred during the century, in 1833, 1865–66, 1876–78, and 1892, and in 1854 in the north-central parts, which have always suffered most severely, these parts having their rainfall diminished by the interposition of the Ghâts both on the E. and W., whereas the Pálghát Gap allows of access of rain from the W. to the south-central parts, which are open to the E. Only once has the famine extended over the coast region N. of the Godávari, though parts of Ganjám suffered severely in 1888–89, while the W. ct. has entirely escaped. About half the area of the Presidency is under cultivation, 13 per cent. more is said to be available, while nearly 20 per cent. is waste land. Forests, most extensive in the W., cover about 18 per cent. of the surface. Among crops rice is the prevailing grain in the parts irrigated directly from rivers, elsewhere millets (rágí, joar, and bájra) and pulses predominate; wheat is scarcely known; cotton is chiefly grown on the tableland and in the extreme S. Among other crops of importance are indigo (declining), sugar-cane, tobacco, various spices, all kinds of tropical fruits, and on the mountains coffee, tea, and cinchona. The government plantations of cinchona, on the Nílgiri Hills, are the oldest in India, the tree having been first planted there in 1860. On and near the coast coco-nuts abound, and the areca nut, date, palmyra, and other palms are more widely distributed.

The chief minerals are the iron ores of the Salem dist., gold in the Wainád (Wynaad), and salt, obtained by solar evaporation, all round the coast. Weaving is the principal manufacture; industries are mainly for the supply of local markets. The principal standard-gauge railways of M. are those which connect M. city with Bombay, Bangalore, and (through the Pálghát Gap) with Calicut on the W. ct., and Bezwáda (Bezvada) with Haidarábád, and the Madras-Bombay line. In the extreme S. the railways are all on the metre-gauge, and in the N., among other metre-gauge railways, is one connecting Bezwáda with the railway system of southern Bombay. The construction of a standard gauge railway from Bezwáda to Cuttack, in Bengal (destined, no doubt, to be ultimately extended to Calcutta), has been authorised by the government. Along the E. ct. the Buckingham Canal (salt-water) is an important means of communication from the Pálár to the Godávari. The Karnúl Canal also belongs to this Presidency. The principal towns are Madras, Trichinopoli, Madura, Salem, Calicut, Bellary, Negapatam, Tanjore, Combaconum. Dravidian dialects are spoken throughout the entire area of the Presidency, except the extreme NE., where Uriya is spoken, as in Orissa. Hindus form rather more than seven-eighths of the population; of the rest, Mahommedans and Christians are the most numerous. The first British possession in this region was the site on which Fort St. George stands, acquired in 1639; no addition was made to the terr. for more than a century, when Masulipatam was taken from the French. A few years later the N. ct. tract—the Circars—was ceded by the Moghal emperor. At the end of the century the Malabar coast was acquired by the fall of Tipu Sultan, and the west-central divs. of Salem and Coimbatore. Tanjore and the Karnatak were added a year or two later, and in 1838 the Karnúl domains.

Madrid (Arabic Mahubit, Mazerit, or Majerit, 'wind current'), tn., the cap. of Spain, prov. of M. and of the military captaincy of New Castille, seat of a bishopric under Toledo. It is the highest cap. of Europe, situated on a small plateau (alt. 2140 ft.) in the middle of a large sandy arid plain on the (E.) banks of the small riv. Manzanares (dry in summer), almost in the centre of Spain, with a perimeter of more than 13 m. Conquered from the Moors in the 11th century, M. was up to the 16th century a royal hunting seat, often residence of Charles V., and was formerly made the cap. under Philip II. (1560). The oldest quarters of the town are S. (Moreria, Lavapies, Plaza Mayor). Almost all the buildings are posterior to the 17th century. In 1868 the old walls were demolished, and the town greatly enlarged. The new quarters are N. and NE. (Olavide, Salamanca). It possesses the Central University, an Industrial College, Academy of Art, Conservatorio of Music, National Library (300,000 vols., 300,000 MSS.), museums of archæology and natural science, an astronomical and meteorological observatory (40° 24′ 29.7″ N., 3° 41′ 16″ W.). The gallery of paintings (Museo del Prado) is one of the richest in the world. Manufactures of tobacco, powder, gold and silver smith's works, tapestry, ceramics. Native place of Ercilla, Lope de Vega, Quevedo, Tirso de Molina, and Calderon. The climate is very dry, very hot in summer, very cold in winter, with a powerful irradiation, and very dangerous for delicate people. Mean temp. (29 yrs.) 55.7°, (max.) Aug. 107°, (min.) Jan. 13°; rfall., 15⅓ in. in 94 days; 131 days of clear blue sky. P. (1877) 397,000; (1887) 470,000. [J. B. R.]

Magdalena, tn. and stn., Argentine Republic, Buenos Aires, on the Rio de la Plata, 52 m. SE. by E. Buenos Aires. P. 4000.

Magdalena, dep., Colombia, on NE. ct., cap. Santa Marta.

Magdalena, chief riv. and great water-highway of Colombia, rises near the S. of the republic in the same mountain knot, the Paramo de las Papas, as its main trib. the Cauca, and flows on the whole N., till it enters the Caribbean Sea by two arms, enclosing the small deltaic island of Los Gomez, in 74° 55′ W. At its mouth is a bar, which varies greatly in depth in short intervals of time, in consequence of which it is now rarely entered, goods being conveyed between the seaport of Sabanilla, W. of the river mouth, and Barranquilla, the chief river-port (15 m. above the mouth), by a railway 18 m. long. Higher up the M. is connected with Cartagena (q.v.) both by a canal and by railway, and river steamers navigate the river both from Barranquilla and Cartagena, ascending as high as Jirardot, 718 m. above Barranquilla, occasionally as high as Neiva, 830 m. from the same port; but between Facaloa (below Mompos) and Banco, a stretch of 107 m., the steamers forsake the main stream and follow the Cauca and the Loba, a river arm connecting the M. at Banco with the Cauca at Guamal. Besides the places mentioned, the chief river-ports are Puerto Berrio (471 m. above Barranquilla), the port of Medellin, and Honda, or rather its adjacent river-port Caracolí, the port of Bogotá, 600 m. above that port. Chief r. bk. trib. the Sogamoso. Total length of river, 1060 m.; area of basin, 95,770 sq. m.; mean discharge, 263,500 cubic ft. per second.

Magdeburg (name derived from Magatha-Burg, 'castle of the virgin'), cap. Prussian prov. Saxony and govt. M., lying in the N. German Plain, 134 ft. above sea-level, on the Elbe, in 52° 8′ N. lat., and 11° 40′ E. long. M. is one of the most powerful fortresses of the German Empire, its position being of very great strategical importance, as it is situated on the direct road which connects Cologne with Berlin and Danzig. The fortifications include 13 detached forts, which surround the town. The country around M. is unattractive. M. is a great mart for sugar, corn, and other agricultural produce; its principal manufactures are machinery, ironware, spirits, tobacco, cigars, artificial manures, cement, potteries, chemicals, and textiles. M. owes its commercial importance to its position on a great navigable river (see Elbe), and to its splendid railway connections, it being situated at the point where the lines from Berlin, Hamburg, and Leipzig converge. The town was founded by Charlemagne in 805, as a stronghold against the attacks of the Wends and Avars. Its terrible fate in the Thirty Years' War is well known; in 1631 it was taken by storm by Tilly, and completely burnt down, 30,000 people perishing. P. (1816) 36,400; (1870) 80,000; (1890) including since 1887 Buckau, Neustadt-M., and Sudenburg, tn. P. 117,600, comm. P. 202,200. [H. C. S.]

Magellan, Strait of, strait between Tierra del Fuego and the mainland of S. America, about 200 m. long, but with a very varying width (2½ to 11 m.). Discovered in 1520 by the Portuguese navigator Magalhães, who, however, is generally known under name of Magellan, a French and English form derived from the Spanish form Magallanes, because at the time of his great voyage he was in Spanish service. Cannot be navigated by night on account of sinuosities and absence of lights. Coal worked at Punta Arenas. The terr. on both sides of the strait is now entirely in Chilean hands.

Mahánadí, or Mahanuddy ('the Great River'), riv., India, rises in the Central Provs., 25 m. S. Ráipur, S. of the fertile plain of Chhattísgarh (Chutteesgurh). It winds northwards on the E. and S. of this plain before breaking through the Ghâts in the gorge of Báramúl, 40 m. long. Its stream here is navigable at all seasons. It emerges from the Ghâts through a narrow defile at Naráj, 7 m. W. Cuttack, pouring down on the plains of Orissa (q.v.), where it forms an intricate delta embracing a stretch of more than 100 m. of coast from Lake Chilká northwards, finally forming two principal estuaries, one the Devi in the SE., and the other, which goes by the name of the Mahánadí, just S. of False Point (22° 20′ N.). Numerous streams flowing from mountains in the N., S., and W. belong to its basin in the plain of Chhattísgarh, but in this part of its course the Mahánadí is not navigable. Small boats of 25 tons burden ascend to Sambalpúr, at the head of the gorge of Báramúl. Above Sambalpúr it can be used in the rains for floating timber. Length, 512 m; area drained, 52,637 sq. m.; height of source, 2300 ft.; maximum flood discharge, 1,800,000 cubic ft. per second; in the dry weather its discharge dwindles to 1125 cubic ft. per second. Great number of streams furnishing water-power, the Penobscot, Kennebec, Androscoggin, partially navigable, and the Saco being the chief. Climate severe, frosts extending through nearly seven months. [Eastport, Portland.] Cutting and shipping of ice a considerable industry. Consumption causes one-fourth of the deaths. The forests of pine, spruce, and hemlock, and deciduous trees covering nearly one-half the state, yield lumber, tan-bark, firewood, and maple sugar. Besides the manufacture of lumber, there is a large output of cotton and woollen goods, boots and shoes, leather, and a large total of many minor products. Wooden vessels are built, but much fewer than formerly, and the state has a large maritime trade; in cod, mackerel, and herring fisheries, second only to Massachusetts. Granite (in Knox and Hancock cos.), marble, slate (in Piscataquis), and limestone (in Knox co.) are quarried. Agriculture has declined, except in the very fertile co. of Aroostook, since the fertile and easily tilled prairie lands of the W. began to produce for the eastern markets. The population tends to become more urban with immigration, principally of French-Canadians and Irish, and the development of manufacturing. The Dutch, English, and French, chiefly the two latter, made various attempts at settlement in Maine up to 1651. In that year M. was added to Massachusetts, and remained so till 1820, when it became a state. Bowdoin College, with a state endowment, is at Brunswick, and number Longfellow and Hawthorn among its students. Area, 29,895 sq. m. P. (1890) 661,000. See United States, table. [C. H. L.]

Maine-et-Loire, dep., W. France, traversed from E. to W. by Loire R.; formed out of Anjou, the greater part of which it comprises; divided into 5 arrs.: Angers (cap.), Bangi, Cholet, Saumur, and Segré. The country N. of the Loire consists chiefly of a monotonous tract, highest point, 360 ft. S. of the Loire, in the 'Bocage Angevin' dist., the surface presents greater diversity; highest point, La Garde, 690 ft. The valley of the Loire is noted for its fertility. Granitic and allied rocks predominate in the SE. half of the dep., slaty schists and Calcareous and Tertiary formations in the NW. The dep. belongs wholly to the basin of the Loire, which has a length in it of 50 m., and forms its N. frontier for 25 m. more. R. bk. tribs., Authion and Main, the latter formed by the union of Loir, Sarthe, and Mayenne; l. bk., Layon and Evre. The Loire is navigable, to a greater or less extent, throughout the dep., but its depth is very variable. Climate very humid; subject to fogs. [Angers.] The principal cereals are wheat and oats; the former is grown especially in the arrs. of Cholet and Segré, and in the Loire valley. The vine is extensively cultivated, but the production of wine per acre is under the average for France. (Saumur is noted for its wine.) Other important cultures are hemp and flax. Excellent fruits are grown. Coal is worked to a limited extent in the valleys of the Loire and Layon, and there are important slate quarries near Angers. Textile industries are grouped mainly about Cholet. Area, 2812 sq. m. P. (1891) 518,600. See France, table.

Mainz, in French Mayence, the ancient Magontiacum, or Moguntiacum, tn. and fortress of the first class, Ger., gd.-duchy Hesse, cap. prov. Rhenish Hesse, circle M., on l. bk. of the Rhine, and just below the influx of the Main, and here crossed by a bridge of boats connecting the city with Kastel, which is traversed by the railway from Frankfurt to Wiesbaden. Just above the confluence of the Main the railway crosses to the Main valley. Chief edifices, the cathedral, the old electoral palace, now the property of the town, containing important collections, the museum of the Society for the Investigation of Rhenish History and Antiquities, a picture gallery, and a town library of 150,000 volumes. It is an important seat of river traffic —principally in coal, wine, corn, timber, iron, and colonial wares. Its manufactures also are important. There is a large manufactory of conserves, and manufactures of machinery, pianofortes, furniture, and boots, all on a large scale. The fortifications embrace, besides the town itself, Kastel and Gustavsburg (the former N. of the Main, the latter S. of the Main, for the defence of the railway bridge), and the isls. of Ingelsheim and Petersaue in the Rhine, numerous forts round the town, and a citadel on the S. of the town, this last containing the monument known as the Eigelstein, perhaps erected in honour of Drusus, who founded the fort of Moguntiacum in 13 B.C. M. became the seat of an archbishop in 751, but afterwards became an imperial free city, which it remained till 1462, when it was completely incorporated with the archbishopric, which had previously become an electorate (one of the seven named in the 'Golden Bull' of 1356). From 1797 to 1814 it was cap. of the French dep. of Donnersberg (Mont Tonnerre), and then passed into the possession of Hesse. P. (1816) 25,300; (1871) 53,900; (1890) 71,400.

Malacca, tn., Straits Settlements, on the Strait of Malacca, and at the mouth of the Malacca R., in 2° 11′ N. As early as the 8th century its port was frequented by Arab and Persian merchants. The ruins of a famous church, erected by Albuquerque, and the remains of Portuguese and Dutch forts, occupy several heights around the town. It is said to have been founded in 1252, was taken by the Portuguese in 1511, by the Dutch in 1641, and by the English in 1795. It was again held by the Dutch from 1818 to 1825, when, with its territory, they exchanged it with the British for Benkulen in Sumatra. The settlement, previously a dependency of the Bengal Presidency, was separated therefrom in 1851. Mean temp. (2 yrs., 1885–86), yr. 82.1° F., Jan. 81.7°, July 82.4°. Population consists of Malays and Chinese, a race of these people being intermixed with descendants of the early Portuguese, Arab, and Hindu settlers.

Between the eastern mountains and the coast is a hilly region known as the Axarquia, composed of nummilitic and other Tertiary limestones, largely covered with maquis (evergreen shrubs). Chief river the Guadalhorce, whose valley is ascended by the only railway across the mountains, proceeding N. to Córdoba, with a branch on the N. of the mountains running E. from Bobadilla by Antequera to Granada. A high-road along the coast from the town of M. to Gibraltar is in progress. The principal products are southern fruits, above all, oranges and grapes, besides wine. Cotton and sugar-cane are also grown, though the cultivation of the latter has declined since Spanish sugar ceased to be protected by customs duties against that of the Spanish colonies. In the mountains are numerous deposits of iron ore, lead, copper, graphite, and other minerals; but the defectiveness of the communications is an obstacle to their working, and the only mines of importance are those of iron near Marbella and Estepona, in the W. of the prov. There are sulphurous and other mineral springs at Alora, Alhaurin Grande, Carracatra, and Alhama. See Spain, table.

Malaga, the ancient Malacca, seapt., S. Spain, cap. prov. M., 65 m. NE. by E. Gibraltar. It is an ancient town, built in the form of an amphitheatre, near the foot of a mountain range, commanded by an old castle perched on a pointed rock, and called the Gibralfaro. The Alcazaba, or citadel, is a relic of the Moors. The almost modern cathedral is in Renaissance style. The streets generally are narrow and winding. The climate is magnificent, and the place is rapidly rising as a health resort. Principal manufactures, cigars, soap, and fabrics. M. has also iron-foundries, flour-mills, and sugar factories, and a large export trade in the finest wines, besides southern fruits, olive oil, and lead from the mines of Linares. The port has a depth at entrance and inside of 17–19 ft. There are no docks, but harbour works are in progress. M. is said to have been founded by Phœnicians. It afterwards passed into the hands of the Carthaginians, Romans, and Arabs (Moors), from the last of whom it was retaken by Ferdinand of Aragon, after a three months' siege, in 1487. In December 1884 and January 1885 it suffered considerably from earthquakes. Mean temp., yr. 66.9° F., Jan. 54.0°, Aug. 81.3°. P. (1877) 116,000; (1887) 134,000.

Malagarazi, riv., Africa, the most important affluent of Lake Tanganyika, which it enters in 5° 15′ S. It is composed of three branches, which drain an immense extent E. of the lake. Its source is near that of the Lobugati, in 2° 40′ S.; it receives from the E. the Gombe, and from the S. the Sindi or Ugalla; at its sources and those of its affluents it almost touches rivers flowing to the Mediterranean and Indian Oceans, while its own waters, by the Lukuga and Congo, flow towards the Atlantic. Rapids stop navigation about 8 m. above its mouth. Breadth of mouth about 1800 ft.

Malay (or Eastern) Archipelago, or Malaysia, names given by modern geographers to a great div. of the globe, extending from the N. point of Formosa, in 25° N. to 12° S., and from 93° to 105° E., bounded N. by the N. Pacific Ocean, W. by the Indian Ocean, Strait of Malacca, Chinese Sea, and along the parallel of 25° N., the S. boundary being the parallel of 12° S. It comprises the Sunda Is., Borneo, Celebes, Moluccas, Philippines, &c.; chiefly inhabited by the Malay race. This vast island-world extends in a general direction from NE. to SW., the largest islands being nearest the continent of Asia. It belongs to the greatest volcanic region of the world, which stretches in the form of a quadrant from the island of Cheduba, through the Andaman and Nicobar Is., Sumatra, Java, the Sunda Isles, and Banda. From the W. side of Formosa, one volcanic belt passes through the Philippines, on the meridian of 120°, and the SW. point of Celebes, to Flores; and another, more easterly, through Mindanao to the NW. of New Guinea. On the S. this belt extends to New Zealand, and on the N. to Kamchatka. The volcanic mountains are mostly of trachyte; basalt and granite occur in Java, and obsidian in Bali; the chalk and tertiary formations are widely extended. The volcanic peaks of the archipelago rise at once from the level of the sea, so that their relative and absolute heights are the same. The islands belong mainly to the Dutch, but the N. & NW. of Borneo are British, the Philippine Is., with Palawan and the Sulu Is., belong to Spain, and a portion of Timor is Portuguese.

Malay Peninsula, the most southerly portion of continental Asia, and of its great SE. penin. of Further India, mostly between 1° and 13° N., 98° and 104° E., connected northward to upper Siam by the Isthmus of Kra, and having E. the Gulf of Siam and the China Sea, S. and W. the Strait of Malacca. Malaya proper, or Malacca, extends from 1° 20′ to 5° N. The country, as far as 5½° N. on the W. ct., 4° N. on the E. ct., comprising the states of Lakon, Keda, Kalantan, Tringano, &c., is claimed by Siam, S. of which it is wholly under British influence, the terr. either belonging to the Straits Settlements (q.v.), or being subdivided among native states under British protection or in alliance with the British. In 1874 British residents were appointed to Perak and Selangor, in 1885 to Sungei Ujong and Jelebu, in 1888 to Pahang (on the E. ct.), in 1889 to the confederation known as Negri Sembilan, and in 1887 the sultan of Johor (the southernmost state) placed his foreign relations under British control. The M. P. is traversed throughout by a mountain chain rising from 2–4000 ft. in height, but decreasing on proceeding to the S., where it dies out in the N. of Johor. This range now forms the richest tin-mining region in the world.

(at present producing about half the world's produce of tin), the most of it being mined in Perak and Sungei Ujong. Pahang also produces gold. Surface well watered, and fine timber, with bamboos, areca palms, sago, gutta percha, and an abundance of valuable resins, gums, drugs, with nutmegs, cloves, cinnamon, tobacco, coffee, pepper, tea, indigo, are produced. Rice and other grains are not raised in sufficient quantity for the home demand, and are imported from Bengal and Sumatra. The population consists principally of Siamese and Malays, but the natives are being ousted in trade and industry by Chinese and Klings, Chinese supplying all or nearly all the labourers in the mines and the coffee, tea, nutmeg, pepper, and tapioca plantations which have been started by Europeans. At present there are only a few short railways connecting the capitals or chief mining centres of the more important states with the nearest seaports, but a trunk road and railway through the British part of the penin. are about to be constructed. Total area about 45,000 sq. m. See Straits Settlements and the articles on the separate states.

Malays, branch of the Mongolic division of the human race. The term is used (1) in a broad general sense, and (2) in a more special sense. (1) The M. race includes all the tribes of the East Indies, except those of Papuan and Negrito blood, those of the Malay Penin. S. of 8° or 9° N. lat., the Hovas of Madagascar, the Polynesians of the Pacific, from New Zealand to Hawaii, and from Easter I. to Sumatra, certain of the races in the Philippines and in Formosa, and some of the Melanesian tribes. (2) The Malays proper include the Malays of Malacca and Sumatra, the ancient houses of the M. race, the Battak of Sumatra, the Javanese and Sundanese of Java, the Dayak of Borneo, the Macassars, Buginese, and Alfures (not pure) of Celebes, and the Tagals and others of the Philippines and Formosa. The M. are typically short of stature, have straight black hair, high cheek bones, and oblique eyes; their skin is some shade of light brown, their head measurement mesocephalic to brachycephalic. The Battak, Macassars, Buginese, and some others show a modification of type approaching to the Indo-European. The M. have for centuries been keen traders, and bold and skilful navigators, and make clever craftsmen in weaving, carving, turning, goldsmiths' work, iron-work, the manufacture of arms, leather, and boats (jwahus). Their houses are generally built of bamboo, raised on piles. The M. language is employed as the lingua franca of the East Indies. [J. T. B.] Maldive (or Maledíva, native name Mahaldib) Islands, group of coral isls., Indian Ocean, between 0° 42′ S. and 7° 6′ N., 72° 33′ and 73° 44′ E.; tributary to Ceylon, and governed by a Sultan. Composed of 19 (for political purposes reckoned as 13) atolls, divided into three principal groups, the N., Central, and S., by the large channels of Cardiva and 'a Degree and a Half.' The total of separate islands is popularly, but vaguely, reported to be 12,000 (of which probably more than 200 are inhabited). Amongst the atolls are good channels for ships. The natives are expert navigators, and are largely engaged in bonito fishery, that fish being the principal article of food and commerce. Mali, or King's Island (length, 1 m.; breadth, ⅝ m.) is cap. of the group, and from it all the foreign trade is conducted either by traders from Chittagong, Point-de-Galle, the Malabar coast, or by the islanders themselves in their own vessels. The trade is chiefly with Calcutta, and in bonito fish (chief export), tortoise shell, coco-nuts, coir-yarn, cowrie shells, and a kind of sweetmeat. Imports are rice, dates, salt, leaf tobacco, areca nuts, and manufactured goods. The climate is very unhealthy, the thermometer ranging from 75°–85° F. in the shade. P. of group vaguely estimated at 200,000.

Malta (Melita), isl. of the Mediterranean, a dependency of Great Britain, 54 m. SSW. the S. point of Sicily, about one-third of the size of Anglesey. Length, 17⅛ m.; greatest breadth, 8⅛ m. Cape Valetta, on NE. side, is in 35° 53′ 8″ N., 14° 31′ 2″ E. Shape nearly oval; coast indented with numerous bays. Surface naturally a bare calcareous rock, containing numerous grottoes, and abounding in fossil remains, including those of two pigmy elephants of Post-pliocene age, respectively 4–5 and 2½–3 ft. in height, which are of interest as proving that at that time the group to which it belongs must have been connected with the mainland. The eastern two-thirds of the island are composed mainly of Globigerina Limestone, with considerable areas of Lower Coralline Limestone, the remainder, which contains all the higher elevations (up to 845 ft. on the SW. coast) mainly of Upper Coralline Limestone, with narrow strips of Greensand. The soil of Malta is entirely derived from the disintegration of the subjacent rocks, the tradition that the soil was imported being probably due to the fact that Roman puzzolana was actually imported in considerable quantities for imparting hydraulic qualities to the fat lime of the native soil. The soil has, however, been all prepared artificially, the natives having collected the residue of the rocks from cracks, crevices, and potholes to spread on their fields. The depth of the soil is little more than a foot. Limestone is extensively exported for building, chiefly to the Levant. Almost the entire surface of the island is cultivated, the chief crops being grain, potatoes, and fruit (the orange, olive, and fig compared to those of tropical climates for excellence), and the garden flowers are most odoriferous. The honey of Malta is highly valued, and fish abound on the coasts. Horses small, but active; mules and goats excellent; and the birds have gorgeous plumage. The climate of Malta resembles that of Africa more than Europe. Variations are sudden, and storms from the NE., the gregale, violent and destructive; during a N. wind the air is cold and clear, but during the prevalence of the sirocco (SE. wind), in spring and autumn, the temperature rises to 95° F., and its effects are most debilitating. Frost and snow are unknown; ice is imported from Sicily. The principal manufactures consist of gold and silver jewellery, especially filigree work, and lace. Total exports (which include large quantities of early potatoes, sent principally to the United Kingdom), are estimated at about a quarter of a million stg.; imports, which include cottons, coals, woollens, coffee, apparel, sugar, linens, iron, beer and ale, indigo, butter, earthenware, &c., about £2,500,000 annually. The transit amounts on an average to £23,000,000 yearly. Legal tender currency is exclusively English. St. Paul's Bay, on the NE. shore, is the traditional spot where the apostle was wrecked. The Maltese group comprises, besides Malta, the isl. of Gozo, and the islets of Comino, Filfla, and Cominotto, and a few others. Government vested in the commandant of the garrison, and council of twenty members, six officials, and fourteen elected, nine of these representing Malta, one Gozo, and four certain classes of the population. The prevailing language is a debased Arabic, that of the upper classes Italian. Established religion, Roman Catholic; but there is toleration for Protestants. From its position on the route to Egypt and India, the immense strength of its fortifications, and its noble harbour (one of the grandest in the world, great extensions made to it being completed in 1874), Malta is one of the most valuable colonial possessions of the British Empire. Malta was held by the Romans B.C. 242. In the 5th century A.D. it fell into the hands of the Goths and Vandals. The Saracens invaded M. in 828, 836, and finally in 870, when it surrendered to them, and remained in their hands till 1090, when it was taken by Count Roger the Norman. During the succeeding centuries it often changed hands. In 1530 it was taken by Charles V., and granted, with Gozo and Tripoli, to the Knights of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem on their expulsion from Rhodes. In 1568 it was ineffectually besieged by Solyman the Magnificent and the flower of the Turkish army; the Knights held it till 1798, when, through treachery, it was surrendered to the French, from whom it was taken by the British in 1800, and its cession confirmed by the Treaty of Paris in 1814, and the Congress of Vienna in 1815. Shortest sea distance to Plymouth, 2020 m.; to Alexandria, 820 m.; to Marseilles, 650 m. From Valetta, which as a port of call is second in importance to few in the world, a short railway (7½ m.) runs inland to Rabat, and there are direct cables to Gibraltar, Bona, Sicily (2), and Alexandria (2). Mean temp., yr. 66.6° F., Jan. 56.3°, Aug. 79.7°. [Valetta.] Area, isl., 96 sq. m. (Strelbitsky); col., 119 sq. m. P. (1871), including Gozo and Comino, 142,084; (1891) the group of islands, including troops, 177,457 (1491 per sq. m.); Malta itself, 158,861 (1655 per sq. m.); Gozo, 18,553; Comino, 43. Coast bold and picturesque. Numerous streams water the valleys. Clay-slate is the prevalent formation, with granite in two localities where minerals are worked. Zinc, copper, and lead ores are mined, the lead-mines (at Laxey) being the most productive and the richest in silver in the kingdom. Marble, limestone, and greenstone are quarried, but no coal. Soil fertile. Climate mild and winter open, though rain and gales of wind are frequent. An excellent small breed of horses is reared. For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 7–9. The herring, mackerel, and other fisheries are very actively pursued. The island has constant steam communication from Douglas with Liverpool, Barrow, Fleetwood, and Silloth, and other ports; and a telegraph between Maughold Head and St. Bees. This island, originally peopled by the Manx (Menaviæ), a tribe of the Celtic race, was alternately possessed by the Scotch (under the Lord of the Isles) and the English. It was latterly held as a feudal sovereignty by the Stanleys, and afterwards by the Dukes of Athol, from whom it was purchased for the British crown in 1806; and finally, in 1829, certain remaining privileges were ceded by the duke on receiving an award of £487,000. Government vested in the British sovereign, or the lieutenant of the crown, a council of the bishop and principal functionaries, and the House of Keys, a body of twenty-four proprietors of estates, who possess the legislative power. The island has its own laws, and two supreme judges, called deemsters. Common law courts are held in the six sheadings into which the island is divided, and appeals lie from their decisions successively to the House of Keys, the governor, and the sovereign in council. The island is divided into six sheadings, seventeen pars., treens, and quarterlands. Established religion, that of the Church of England, under the Bishop of Sodor and Man, who has a seat (without a vote) in the British House of Peers. The diocese is coextensive with the island. Revenue, £2000. There are forty places of worship. Each par. has its endowed school, in which English is taught as well as the native Manx, a dialect of the Celtic. The island was a great station of the Druids, and contains numerous vestiges of their circles. Principal towns, Castletown (the cap.), Douglas, Peel, and Ramsay. Manche, dep., NW. France, surrounded NE., N., and W.

by the English Channel, on which it has a coast line of 205 m.; formed in 1790 out of Normandy (Cotentin and Avranchin); divided into six arrs.: Saint Lô (cap.), Avranches, Cherbourg, Coutances, Mortain, and Valognes. The N. part forms the penin. of the Cotentin. Coast low in NE., gradually rising N. to Point Barfleur, then turning W. to Cape La Hogue, forming midway the deep bay on which is Cherbourg. W. coast inhospitable, harbours generally small and obstructed by reefs. The best harbour is that of Granville, off which, at a distance of 8 m., are the Chaussey Isles. In the SW. is the Bay of St. Michel, a marshy tract of about 97 sq. m., lying around the Tombelaine (460 ft.) and Mont St. Michel (400 ft.), through which flow the lower navigable courses of the See, Sélune, and Cuesnon, the whole tract, with the exception of the two rocky eminences, being under water at high tides. The interior of the dep. is crossed by numerous ranges of bold hills, increasing in elevation from 500 ft. in the N. to over 1000 ft. in the S., the culminating point being Saint-Martin de Chaulieu, 1205 ft. in the SE. The valleys are generally fertile. Extensive marshy tracts occur about Carentan and S. of Lessay. The principal rivers are the Vire and Tante, draining the E. of the dep., and which unite to form an estuary between M. and Calvados; N. the Divette; several small streams flow W. Climate mild [Cherbourg]. Cereals are grown chiefly in the E. of the dep.; the principal are wheat, buckwheat, and barley; hemp and flax are important crops, and apple orchards cover large areas, this being one of the leading deps. for cider. Iron is obtained in small quantity in the SE. at Mortain, and coal at Plessis-Garnier. Industries include metallurgical works, shipbuilding (Cherbourg, Barfleur). Area, 7425 sq. m. P. (1891) 513,800. Manchester, the ancient Mancunium, Manutium (derived by Camden from the British 'main,' a stone, on account of the stony character of the site), co. of a city, city, parl. and mun. bor., and par., Eng., in the SE. of the co. Lancaster, on the Irwell, 188 m. (by rail) NNW. London, forming practically one town with Salford, a mun. co. and parl. bor., on the W. side of the Irwell, a narrow stream crossed by numerous bridges. The adjacent bors. occupy a site on the W. side of the Pennine Chain analagous to that occupied by Leeds on the E. side, being situated where several valleys on the W. of that chain converge on the great road from London through Birmingham and the Midlands to the NW. The principal public buildings of the city are the town hall, erected 1868–77, at a cost of £250,000, with a front 200 ft. in extent, sides 400 ft., and a massive tower 235 ft. high; the mayor's reception rooms form a magnificent suite; the royal exchange, erected 1869, covering an area of 5400 sq. yds.; the general post-office, in the Renaissance style, completed 1887, at a cost of £100,000; the assize courts; new city court-house; the royal institution, an edifice of the Ionic order; the free-trade hall, in the Lombardo-Venetian style, built to commemorate the success of the free-trade movement, and affording space for nearly 5000 persons; the free library, opened 1852, now containing over 250,000 volumes, with several branch lending-libraries and news-rooms in different parts of the city; the cathedral, originally the parish church, which was made a collegiate church by royal charter 1422, is an elaborately ornamented Gothic structure. M. was constituted a bishopric in 1847, the diocese including the greater part of Lancashire, except the SW. and NW., a few eccles. pars. in the SW. of Yorkshire, and part of the eccles. pars. of Haughton and Roughton in Cheshire. Many societies have been established in M., including the statistical society, the first of the kind established in the kingdom; the literary and philosophical society, of which the celebrated Dr. Dalton was for many years the president. The chief educational institution is Owens College, the oldest and most important of the three colleges now affiliated to the Victoria University (founded in 1880); the other two being University College, Liverpool, and Yorkshire College, Leeds. Owens College, founded in 1846 by John Owens, who left £100,000 to endow an institution for secular instruction, and incorporated 1871, now occupies extensive buildings erected in 1884 at a cost of £70,000, with an additional block, completed in 1887. It comprises well-equipped chemical, physical, and engineering laboratories. The administration is vested in a council and senate, the latter formed of the whole body of professors. There are numerous fellowships, scholarships, and exhibitions attached to the college, with which is incorporated the royal school of medicine. Other educational institutions are the grammar school, founded in 1519 by Hugh Oldham, D.D., Bishop of Chester, and richly endowed, having 166 foundation scholarships, besides several others, including scholarships at Oxford and Cambridge; Chetham's College, incorporated by Charles II., which has a foundation for 100 boys to be fed, clothed, and educated; a flourishing school of art; the Whitworth Institute, founded 1888, to which was transferred in 1890 the technical school, the whole being now devoted to technical instruction; a technical school at Salford. Amongst medical institutions are the Royal Infirmary, St. Mary's Hospital, various special hospitals and dispensaries. There are many charitable establishments. The streets are well paved, sewered, and, at present, lighted with gas; but the introduction of electric lighting is proposed. Hitherto, water has been supplied from the reservoirs at Woodhead, Beswick, and Gorton, but, in 1879, an Act of Parliament was obtained authorising the bringing of water from Lake Thirlmere, a distance of about 100 m. The works, commenced in 1885, were carried out at a cost of about £4,000,000, and formally inaugurated on the 13th of October 1894. The water is conveyed by tunnels and aqueduct from Thirlmere to the neighbourhood of Bolton, and thence by pipes to the M. reservoirs. The daily supply is estimated at 50,000,000 gallons. There are eleven public parks in M. and Salford—Queen's, Philips', Alexandra, Ardwick, Cheetham, and Birchfields in M.; and Peel, Seedley, Ordsal, Albert, and Kersal in Salford; the largest are Alexandra (60 ac.), opened in 1870, at a cost of £70,000, and Peel (50 ac.). The total area under parks and open spaces exceeds 350 ac. M. has railway communication with all parts of Great Britain; by the construction of the M. Ship Canal, it has been converted into a port, with jurisdiction extending to Ince, and including the port of Runcorn, now a creek of M. harbour. Dock accommodation covers 100 ac., with a quay area of 150 ac.; total length of quays, 6 m. The natural advantages, to which M. owes its position as a great and manufacturing centre, are the tract of surrounding country, and the three streams Irwell, Medlock, and Irk, which traverse it, thus supplying abundant water-power; and, in later times, the vicinity of two great coalfields. The staple trade of M. is the cotton manufacture, to which may be ascribed the rapid increase of the city, the wealth of its inhabitants, and the fact that it is one of the most prosperous cities in the world. The manufacturing history of M. may be said to begin with the establishment of the woollen industry in the reign of Edward III., when a number of Flemish emigrants settled in Lancashire. In the reign of Henry VIII. the town was 'well inhabited,' and distinguished for its trade in linens and woollens. About this time the right of sanctuary, which had till then pertained to M., was transferred to Chester, as being injurious to the manufacturing population. Cotton was first brought to England from the Levant about the end of the 15th century. Edward VI. issued a decree regarding the 'dimensions and weight' of cottons, and Queen Elizabeth commanded (1565–66) that the cottons should 'bear the seal of the Queen's aulnager.' Camden speaks of M. in 1607 as 'eminent specially for its woollen cloth or M. cottons.' In 1650 the manufactures are described as including 'woollens, friezes, fustians, sack-cloths, mingled stuffs, inkles, tapes, and prints,' and the people, as 'the most industrious in the northern part of the kingdom.' Many refugees from the Low Countries and France settled in M., and by their skill greatly contributed to its progress. In 1720 it is said to be 'the largest, most populous, and busy village in England.' At this time yarn came chiefly from Ireland and Scotland, with some from Hamburg; that from Ireland was woven into linen and sent back to the country. The difficulty of obtaining yarn in sufficient quantity was, however, a serious obstacle to the development of trade. During the latter part of the 18th century a great impetus was given to textile manufactures by the invention of various mechanical aids—the water-frame, spinning-jenny, mule-jenny, and Cartwright's loom, and the application of steam-power to cotton-spinning in 1789. The manufacture of calicoes was begun about 1773, that of muslins in 1780. Raw cotton was first imported from the E. Indies and N. America in 1788. The following figures, giving respectively the quantity of raw cotton imported and the value of cotton goods exported, shows the rapid and enormous expansion of trade during the latter part of the 18th century. In 1780, 3100 tons, £335,000; 1790, 14,000 tons, £1,662,339; 1800, 25,000 tons, £5,406,500. The population of M. and Salford is said to have been 25,136 in 1773; in 1780 it was estimated at 50,000. M. has now a large number of cotton factories, some on a vast scale, for spinning, weaving, and printing; besides bleach-works, silk mills, and factories for every description of fibre. M. existed under the Romans, possibly in the earlier British period. In 1222, Henry III. granted to the town the right to hold a weekly market and a yearly fair. In 1301, Thomas de Gresley, Baron of M., granted a charter to the burgesses. In 1832, M. and Salford were constituted parl. bors.; in 1838 M. was incorporated, and in 1844, Salford. In 1853, M. was constituted a city. M. now sends six members to the House of Commons, one for each of the following divs.: NW., N., NE., E., S., and SW.; Salford sends three members, one for each of the divs.: N., W., and S. The principal market, Smithfield, fruit and vegetable market, covering an area of nearly four acres, with a glass roof, is one of the handsomest and most convenient markets in the kingdom. The market-days are Tu., Th., F., and S. Mean rfall. (1866–80), Ardwick (alt. 140 ft.), 36.3 in.; Fairfield (alt. 312 ft.), 38.8 in. Manchester Ship Canal extends from M. docks to Eastham on the Mersey estuary. The portion of the canal above Latchford (14½ m.) is supplied by Irwell, Mersey, and smaller streams; the lower is semi-tidal. At Mode Wheel, Barton, Irlam, and Latchford are two parallel locks, respectively 600 by 65 ft. and 350 by 30 ft. At Eastham, where the canal opens into the Mersey, are three parallel locks, respectively 600 by 80 ft., 350 by 50 ft., and 150 by 30 ft. Ellesmere Port, Weaver Mouth, and Runcorn are provided with tidal openings 200 yds. long to admit the water when it rises outside above the ordinary level of the canal. Minimum bottom width, 120 ft., as compared with 88 in the Amsterdam, and 72 in the Suez Canals; minimum depth, 26 ft. (same as Suez, Amsterdam, 23 ft.). The Bridgewater Canal (q.v.), which joins the Manchester Ship Canal at Runcorn, is carried across the upper course at Barton by a movable bridge, worked by hydraulic power. The Ship Canal is crossed by several permanent railway and road swing-bridges. Constructed 1887–93, at a cost of about £15,000,000. The lower section to Ellesmere Port was opened for traffic in 1891, and the whole on Jan. 1, 1894. The canal was formally opened by Her Majesty, May 1894. Length, 35½ m. * According to 'Consular Report,' China, No. 6, 1885, 15,000,000.

The whole of the S. and E. is occupied by considerable ranges of volcanic hills 3–6000 ft. in height, covered with dense woods, having a general NE. to SW. direction; in the N. the ranges, separated from the preceding by the broad valley of the Sungari, constitute part of another system, also volcanic, forming the Khingan Mts. A plain of vast extent, however, exists on the middle course of the Sungari, and along the Nonni; and another in the SW., formed of alluvial deposit brought down by the Sira-muren or Liau-ho, where the accretion of the land along the coast of the Gulf of Liautung is still proceeding at a very rapid pace. Except in the SW. and round the fringes of the country, M. is almost coextensive with the basin of the Sungari R., an affluent of the Amur, the chief tribs. to which are the Nonni from N. and the Hurka, or Mutan, from S.; in the SW. the Liau-ho flows to the Gulf of Pechili. The Argun in the NW., the Amur in the NE., and the Usuri in the E., divide M. from Russian terr.; whilst the Yalu, flowing to the Yellow Sea, and the Tumen, to the Sea of Japan, separate from Korea. The climate one of extremes [Newchwang], the winters very severe, lasting from six to sometimes nine months in the N.; the wet season commences at the end of May, the rain usually coming from the S. The forests are very valuable, the pine, walnut, oak, and elm being conspicuous for their size. Wild beasts are numerous, and include bears, tigers, panthers, leopards, wild boars, monkeys, deer, &c.; pheasants and wild geese are found in immense numbers in eastern M., and bustards in the plains. The country is exceedingly fertile, especially in the plains, and agriculture is the chief occupation of the people; in Fengtien the surface is being rapidly cleared, and but little unclaimed land exists. Beans and peas are largely cultivated, but more attention has of late years been devoted to cereals, which are fast taking the place of pulse; wheaten flour is used to a large extent, and is unusually cheap; cotton, indigo, tobacco, and the poppy are also important articles of cultivation, the native grown opium having almost completely supplanted the Indian drug. The mineral wealth is believed to be very great, but it is almost wholly undeveloped; coal of admirable quality is very sparingly worked in the neighbourhood of Kirin, and in the hills SE. of Mukden, also at Tunghwa-hsien further E., near to which there are small iron-works, and some gold-washing is carried on, and where silver-mining has been tried but found unremunerative; a gold-mine is worked by the government near Sansing, on the lower Sungari, and a good deal of gold is exported, but private mining is prohibited. An important salmon-fishery takes place on the lower Sungari and the Hurka in the autumn, when immense quantities of this fish are caught and dried for winter use. The manufactures are unimportant; some cotton cloth and silk are made for home service, and soda is prepared on the steppes of the Sungari; distilleries are numerous, and bean-oil is extracted, which forms the staple export. Other products of great value are very fine sable, tiger, and lynx skins, ginseng, and deer horns. The only means of communication are by the larger rivers, navigable during the summer, and by pack-horses and carts on roads which in summer are usually deep in mud, without hard bottoms, and really impracticable, and it is only in winter, when the ground is frozen, that transport can be effected, when the roads present a lively aspect. Telegraph lines connect all the frontier stations with Peking and unite with the Siberian system; there is no postal establishment. For exports and imports, see Newchwang, through which port nearly the whole commerce of the country is carried on. Though the law administered is the same as in China proper, and in the more settled parts there is the same civil organisation, yet the administration is essentially a military one, and the chief appointments are all held by military officers. Brigandage is rife, especially in the northern prov.; but a large army is maintained, and active measures are taken by the Chinese authorities to suppress it. With regard to the population, perhaps the most noticeable point is the paucity of Manchus inhabiting the country; since the establishment of the Manchu dynasty at Peking in 1644, the original inhabitants have been gradually drained off to China to recruit the Imperial army, and their places are now being taken by emigrants from Shantung, Pechili, and Korea, so that the population has greatly increased during recent years, especially in the S. Nearly all special Manchu customs have disappeared, and the language and alphabet are fast being replaced by Chinese. The people are materially better off than in any other part of the empire; wages are higher, they are better clothed and fed, and there is little pauperism. Moral and spiritual culture, however, have not kept pace with the advance of material prosperity; temples and schools, especially the latter, are very scarce, but Christian missions are carried on with much success. Besides the caps. of the provs., other principal towns are Aigun on the Amur, Ninguta, Hunchun, and Hulan, also the treaty port of Newchwang, and Port Arthur, at the extremity of the Kwangtung penin., which continues open throughout the winter. The S. part of the country (Fengtien prov.) was for centuries subject to Korea, but since the 8th century it has been incorporated with China; the other two provs. did not come under the direct control of Peking until 1644, when the Manchus conquered China, and established the present dynasty. A large area, formerly belonging to Manchuria, is now included in Siberia (q.v.). See Japan, end of article. [W. J. T.]

Manila, frequently spelt in English Manilla, a fortified city of the Philippines, and the cap. of the Spanish possessions in the East, on the SW. coast of the isl. Luzon, at the head of the Bay of M. Lat. of cathedral, 14° 35′ N., long. 121° 2′ 4″ E. The city proper, little more than 2 m. in circumference, communicates across the navigable riv. Pasig, with the important commercial suburbs Binondo, San Nicolas, Quiapo, &c., on the N. bank. M. has a cathedral of the 17th century, archbishop's palace, university school of art, and a large government cigar factory. The vicinity is thickly studded with orchards and plantations of cotton, cacao, and coffee, and it is the seat of an extensive commerce. The bay and harbour are at the mouth of the Pasig R. (q.v.). Exports comprise sugar, hemp, cordage, leaf tobacco and cigars, indigo, coffee, cotton, rice, leather, dyewoods, rum, sapan-wood, mother-of-pearl, tortoise-shell, &c. Imports cotton fabrics, silks, woollens, drugs, clocks, and jewellery. The port has a patent slip-way 820 ft. long, with 2000 tons lifting-power. The city was taken and erected into a colonial cap. by the Spaniards in 1571. The site is a large part swampy, and many of the houses in that part are built of bamboos on piles. M. has often been visited by destructive earthquakes (a very disastrous one in 1645, eight during the 19th century, the last in 1863, 1869, 1880, 1881). It is also exposed to typhoons (vaguios; a very violent one in 1883). Mean temp. (15 yrs.), 80.2° F.; mean rfall., cold season (Nov.–Feb.), 8.7 in.; hot season (March–June), 10.5 in.; wet season (July–Oct.), 36 in. P. 154,000; including suburbs about 300,000, of whom about 15,000 are Europeans.

Manila, Bay of, large bay in the SW. of isl. Luzon, Philippine Is.; mouth (10 m. wide) in 14° 15′ N.; expands in the interior to a width of 35 m., the NW. portion forming the Bay of Pampanga. At its mouth is the island of Corregidor.

Manipur, or Imphal, the Kasse or Kathé of the Burmese, native state, India, in SE. of Assam, consisting principally of a considerable valley in the heart of difficult mountainous country, with dense forests, the greatest altitude of the hills in the N. being 8000 ft. The conformation of the valley is that of a shallow saucer, the lowest part of which is Lake Logták, to the N. of which lake is M., cap. of state. The rivers are insignificant; iron is obtained from the beds of small streams; salt, from salt-wells in the valley, which has a temperate climate. Alt. 2500 ft.; area, 8300 sq. m. P. about 220,000.

Manipuri, or Manapouri, lake in the SW. of the South I. of New Zealand, very irregular in outline; receives from the N. the surplus waters of Lake Te Anau, and drained S. by the Waiau into the S. Pacific Ocean, W. of Foveaux Strait. Alt. 610 ft.; area, 50 sq. m.

Manitoba' (from the Cree Indian Manito-waban, 'spirit's strait,' on account of the peculiar agitation of the waters at the Narrows), large lake, Dominion of Canada, in the middle of prov. M., 120 m. long NNW. to SSE.; greatest breadth (S. end), 30 m.; very irregular in outline, especially the N. half, which is nearly shut off from the S. half by a strait called the Narrows less than a mile in width. The lake receives in the N. the Water-hen R. from Lake Winnipegosis, and is drained E. through Lake Martin by the Little Saskatchewan into Lake Winnipeg. Alt. 810 ft.; area, 1900 sq. m.

Manitoba, prov. of the Dominion of Canada, about one-fourth larger than England, lying between Ontario and Keewatin on the E., and Assiniboia and Saskatchewan on the W.; nearly rectangular in shape, stretching 280 m. E. to W. (95° 10′–101° 21′ W.) along the U.S. frontier (Minnesota and N. Dakota), and 260 m. S. to N. (49°–52° 50′ N.); cap. Winnipeg. It includes the whole of Lake M. besides the greater part of Lakes Winnipeg and Winnipegosis, in addition to many smaller lakes—Dauphin and Swan Lake in the NW., and Pelican, White Water, and other lakes in the SW. Principal rivers, the English R., Red R., Assiniboine, Souris, and Pembina. The surface in the E. is a continuation of the area of ancient crystalline rocks which forms the whole of western Ontario, presenting in some places stretches of wild and rocky scenery, in others dense woods and undergrowth, in others extensive swamps. This is succeeded S. of Lake Winnipeg by what is known as the first prairie steppe, the superficial deposits of which are chiefly those of the extinct Lake Agassiz, the deeper parts of which are now represented by the Red River valley, a valley stretching southwards to the U.S. frontier at an altitude of rather more than 700 ft., with a width of 40 m., a surface perfectly flat and undiversified, and occupied by a soil of great depth and extreme fineness and of unsurpassed fertility. The remainder of the surface to the W. belongs to the second prairie steppe (alt. about 1600 ft.), where the surface is not so level, and is covered with thick deposits of drift, and surmounted here and there by hills such as Turtle Mt. in the SW. (mainly in N. Dakota), and the Riding Hills further N., which, however, nowhere attain a height of more than 500 ft. above the prairie. The hill tracts are mostly composed of gravel, and wooded. Climate one of extremes [Winnipeg, Gimli, Minnedosa], but very healthy, the chief drawbacks being frequent thunderstorms and hailstorms, and a liability to frosts before the ripening of the grain. Principal crops wheat (of the finest quality) and oats, next in importance barley and potatoes. Average yield of wheat 20 bushels to the acre. M. is one of those parts of the world in which the area under wheat has increased with great rapidity in the decade 1880, as is shown by the following figures, in which 'acres' stand for thousands of acres of wheat:—

Years.	1881.	1882.	1883.	1884.	1885.	1886.
Acres.	51	...	209	307	367	380
Years.	1887.	1888.	1889.	1890.	1891.	1894.
Acres.	432	518	623	746	917	1010

Minerals are unimportant, but lignite occurs in the M. portion of Turtle Mt., and a seam of good coal has been reported in the SE. near the Lake of the Woods and the Minnesota frontier. There are several salt-springs in the NW. near Lake Winnipegosis and Swan Lake, and in the S. at Rosenfeld. The Red R. is an important means of communication, and the Assiniboine is also navigable, though little used for the purpose. Winnipeg, situated at the confluence of these two rivers, is the greater centre of trade and communications, numerous railways radiating from it in different directions, principally S. and W. The Legislative Assembly consists of a single chamber of thirty-eight members. Area, 73,957 sq. m. (of which 9890 sq. m. water). P. (1891) 152,500. See Canada, table.

Maria Theresia Dollar, coin largely circulating in N. Africa and in the central and eastern Sudan, to some extent also in the Levant—value, 4s. 2d. The range of the Maria Theresia dollar in Africa extends from Tripolis to Ghadames and Sokoto, and from there to Bagirmi, the Bahr-el-Ghazal terrs., and central Abyssinia. Moreover, on the E. ct. it is in use on both shores of the Red Sea, and on the Somali and Zanzibar coasts as far S. as 10° S. lat. The question of the date which this interesting coin bears has been frequently discussed, and various dates have been given by different travellers, e.g., 1780 (Rohlfs), 1788 (Barth), 1792 (Portal). The writer of this article has, however, been informed by the Vienna mint authorities, that the only date of the genuine Maria Theresia dollar now in circulation is 1780, the year in which the Empress Maria Theresia died. All later dates are either incorrectly given, or refer to subsequent sovereigns. During the period from 1885 to 1894 the numbers of Maria Theresia dollars annually struck at Vienna varied from 166,200 (1891) to 3,470,000 (1893), the total number during these ten years being 14,890,636. Maritime Province (Primorskaya Oblast'), a prov. of Russian Empire, which is a strip of territory along the Siberian coast of the Pacific Ocean from Corea to Arctic Ocean, including Kamchatka and several small islands along the coast; length, 2300 m.; width, 40–230 m. Land of Chukchis in the N., a barren plateau, 1000–2000 ft. high, deeply indented by the Anadyr and its tribs., and fjords Kolyuchin, Anadyr, Penzhina, and Gizhiga, and bordered in the N. by mountains attaining 8200 ft. (Makachinga); inhabited by Chukchis (P. about 10,000) and Koryaks. Kamchatka Penin. (q.v.) stretches S. from this plateau. The middle part of M. P. is a narrow strip of land (40–60 m.) along the shores of Sea of Okhotsk, being the woody slopes of Stanovoi Mountains, only visited by Tunguses, and the basin of the Ud'. The southern part comprises four distinct regions: (a) a low valley, about 500 ft. alt., which runs from Shantar Islands to the junction of Amur with Usuri and thence to lower Sungari, and is covered with countless lakes and marshes, large tracts being periodically inundated in summer—the valley of the lower Amur is but thinly peopled; (b) between the lower Amur and Usuri and the Pacific coast the country is filled by wild forest-clad mountains, almost quite unexplored yet; (c) the valley of the Usuri, which is peopled with Russian Cossack villages all along the r. bk; (d) the best part of the prov. is in the S. of the upper Usuri and Lake Khangka, towards the Gulf of Peter the Great. A railway has now been constructed from Vladivostok (q.v.), in this gulf, to Grafskaya (1250 m. to the N. of it) on the upper Usuri, and is being built along the river to Khabarovsk. The climate of the whole prov. is very severe, owing to cold Kuro-sivo current which flows along the coast from the Sea of Okhotsk. The average yearly temperatures are: 39.5° at Vladivostok (43° 7′ N. lat.), 31° at Nikolaievsk, 25.5° at Ayan (56° 27′ N.), and 23° at Okhotsk. The region is divided into nine dists.: South Usuri (chief town Vladivostok), Sofiisk, Nikolaievsk, Udskoi, Okhotsk, Gizhiga, Petropavlovsk (Kamchatka), Anadyr, and Commandor Islands, Sakhalin now forming a separate governorship. The chief towns are mere centres of administration. Khabarovsk (P. 7350) is the cap. of the prov. Area, 715,990 sq. m. P. (1894, estimated) 130,000.

Maritsa, the ancient Hebrus, riv., Rumili, European Turkey, rises on the NE. slope of the Balkan Mts., flows SE. and SSW. to the Ægean Sea opposite Enos. Marne, dep., NW. France, traversed from SE. to NW. by the Marne; formed in 1790 out of Champagne (dists. Champagne Pouilleuse, Rimois, Perthois, Vallage, and Brie); divided into five arrs.: Châlons (cap.), Epernay, Reims, Sainte-Menehould, and Vitry-le-François. The central part consists of the Champagne Pouilleuse, a chalky plain, with slight elevations; in the NW. are low Tertiary hills, which attain SE. of Reims 920 ft., the highest point in the dep.; N. are the wooded, limestone hills of Argonne dist., extending into Ardennes; E., between the M. and the Aisne, the fertile dist. of Perthois; and S. of the M. the wooded dist. of Bocage. The dep. belongs entirely to the basin of the Seine, which itself traverses it only in the extreme SW. for about 11 m. The M. has a course in the dep. of 105 m. navigable, with the aid of a lateral canal, which accompanies it from Couvrot to Epernay, for boats drawing 5½ ft.; the Aisne traverses the NE., and the Vesle, or Vêle, the NW. Climate, see Châlons-sur-Marne. More than one-sixth of the surface is under wood; extensive tracts have been planted with pine in arrs. Reims and Châlons. Cereals are widely cultivated; the principal are wheat (the production of which per acre is considerably above the average for France), rye, and barley; sugar-beet is also an important crop. The vine is cultivated, especially on the hills, in the neighbourhood of Epernay and Avize, and between the M. and the Vesle. Peat for fuel is obtained in Saint-Gond dist. Textile manufactures are important; flannels and woollen stuffs are produced on an extensive scale (Reims); dyeing and wool-combing; cotton hosiery (Epernay arr.). Metallurgical industries include iron and copper foundries, bell-casting (Vitry). Area, 3168 sq. m. P. (1891) 434,700. See France, table.

Marne, the ancient Matrona, riv., France, rises S. of Langres, dep. Haute-Marne, passes Chaumont, Joinville, St. Dizier, Châlons, Château-Thierry, Meaux, and joins the Seine on the right at Charenton. Chief affluents on the left, Petit- and Grand-Morin; on the right, Saulx and Ourcq. At Donjeux begins the Haute-Marne Canal, length 48 m., which runs side by side with the river as far as St. Dizier, then at a somewhat greater distance to Vitry-le-François, the point of junction of the Marne-Rhine Canal. Immediately below Vitry-le-François begins the Marne lateral canal, which runs 40 m. to a point on the river just below Épernay, and communicates at Condé with the Aisne and Marne Canal. The river itself is regarded as navigable from St. Dizier, 238 m. above the mouth, but unnavigable stretches reduce the navigation to about 200 m. Total length of river about 325 m.; area of basin, 4895 sq. m.; discharge varying from 24,700 cubic ft. per second in exceptional floods (more usually 17,700–21,200 cubic ft.) to 600, 500, and even 400 cubic ft. per second at low water.

Marne, vil., Prussia, prov. Schleswig-Holstein, circle Süderdithmarschen, 13½ m. ENE. Cuxhaven. P. <3000.

Marne, Haute-, dep., NE. France, traversed from SSE. to NNW. by the Marne, which rises in the dep.; formed chiefly from Champagne (dists. Bassigny, Perthois, Valiage), partly also from Burgundy and Lorraine, with a small dist. of Franche-Comté; divided into three arrs.: Chaumont (cap.), Langres, and Vassy. Although the dep. forms part of the continental watershed, the elevation is comparatively slight, the highest point, Haut-du-Sec (1695 ft.), SW. of Langres; lowest, at the exit of Voire R., NW. (360 ft.). In the centre, stretching SW. to NE., is the calcareous plateau of Langres, a dreary region, but intersected by many pleasant valleys. The plateau is continued NE. by the Monts Faucilles, of similar formation. This elevated region is known locally as the 'Montagne,' to distinguish it from the Bassigny, or low country; the plateau descends abruptly on the S., more gently on the N., where also are extensive forests. The dep. belongs to the basins of three rivers: Seine, Rhone, and Meuse. The Seine receives more than two-thirds of the drainage by its tribs., Ourcq, Aube, and Marne; the two latter have their source in the dep., as has also the Meuse, which drains a small area in the E. Small tribs. of the Rhone drain the SE. Soil generally poor. Forests cover about one-fourth of the surface. The principal cereals are oats and wheat. Wine is produced in various parts (Aubigny, Montsaugeon, &c.). Iron is the most important mineral (Vassy, Creancy, Latricy). Mineral springs at Bourbonne-les-Bains and other places. Metallurgical industries take the first rank; the production of cast iron and heavy iron goods is carried on chiefly in the valleys of Marne and Blaise (St. Dizier); cutlery (Langres, Nogent, &c.). Area, 2416 sq. m. P. (1891) 243,500. See France, table.

Marne-Rhine Canal, canal serving as means of communication between the two rivers named; begins on the Marne at Vitry-le-François, first ascends the valley of the Ornain, passing Bar le Duc, then crosses (through a tunnel at the summit) to the valley of the Meuse, crosses that river, and then has 16 m. in common with the Canal de l'Est, joins the Moselle below Toul, and ascends that river-valley to the mouth of the Sanon (about midway between Nancy and Lunéville), then ascends the valley of the Sanon, crosses the Vosges in two tunnels, descends by the valley of the Zorn, and joins the Ill below Strassburg, opposite the Ill-Rhine Canal. Total length 196 m., of which 129 m. in France; 180 locks; admits boats of about 5 ft. draught.

Total length about 300 m., of which the last 60, from the rapids at Hermino, the tide-limit, are navigable for vessels of about 16 ft. draught. In the stretch of about 93 m. from these rapids to the confluence of the Tapanahoni (from the SW.) and the Awa (from the S., the latter being the longer, and having the greatest volume of water, and accordingly forming the true headwater of the M.) other ten rapids occur, some of them bad, though none insurmountable at high water. Rapids also interrupt the navigation of the Awa.

Mar Pequeña, or Santa Cruz de Mar Pequeña, port, Africa, SW. Morocco, immediately N. of Cape Nun. In the 16th century Spain possessed a port of this name on this part of the coast, the exact site of which was, however, unknown. It is believed to be the site of the ancient Ifni. Ceded to Spain by treaty, 1859–60.

Marquesas, or Mendaña Islands, group in the Pacific Ocean, between 8° and 11° S., 140° W., comprising 13 islands, the principal being Nukahiva, 70 m. in circuit. Area estimated at 478 m., and population at 4300. Surface mountainous; soil of volcanic origin, and fertile, producing pulse, coco-nuts, yams, bamboos, wild cotton, and sugar-cane. The inhabitants (of the same stock as the Maori of New Zealand) exchange live stock and vegetables in return for muskets, ammunition, and tobacco. There are mission stations in some of the islands, and cannibalism is abolished. Resolution Bay, in Tahuata, and Port Jarvis, in Roapoa, are the best harbours in the islands. Four of these islands were discovered by Mendaña in 1596, the others by Captain Cook in 1774. Since 1842, the chiefs are under a French protectorate. [Polynesia.]

Marsal, tn., Ger., Alsace-Lorraine, circle Château-Salins, 20 m. ENE. Nancy (Fr.), with an important brick embankment, supposed to be Roman, called the Brickwork of the Seille. P. <2000.

Marsala (Arabic Marsa-Allah, 'the port of God;' the ancient Lilybæum), fortified seapt. city of the isl. Sicily, on its W. ct., prov. and 16 m. SSW. Trapani, behind Cape Boeo; cap. circle. It is enclosed by walls, and has a cathedral, several convents and abbeys, a gymnasium, cavalry barracks, and a curious vibrating bell-tower, a famous grotto and well. Near the city are salt-mines and caves of white marble. Its ancient port was filled up in 1580 by Don John of Austria to prevent its becoming useful to corsairs; and the new port, about 1 m. S., bounded by a mole, is adapted only for small vessels (less than 13 ft. draught). Larger vessels lie outside the harbour, and are loaded and discharged by lighters. The principal importance of M. is due to its wine trade, which has grown up within the present century, the wine being the most highly esteemed of those of Sicily. M. also exports corn, cattle, oil, salt, and soda, in small quantities. Lilybæum was long the cap. of the Carthaginian possessions in Sicily, but few traces of it remain. P. (1871) 14,100; comm. P. 34,200; (1881) tn. P. 19,700; comm. P. 40,000.

Marseilles (the usual English form of the French Marseille, the ancient Massilia), comm. and city of the S. of France, cap. dep. Bouches-du-Rhône, 534½ m. by rail SSE. Paris, and on the E. coast of the Gulf of Lions, the shores of which are here minutely indented, the separate bays being separated by rocks, some of which form precipitous cliffs. Lat. of observatory (95 ft.) 43° 17′ 50.1″ N., long. 5° 22′ 2″ E. It is composed of an old and a new town: the former, which once abounded in little hills and crooked streets, has been improved by the formation of new streets and widening some of the old ones; the latter, which comprises the greater part of the area, has wide and straight streets. M. has few public buildings of architectural importance, except the hôtel de ville, the cathedral, the château d'eau, imperial palace, exchange, law courts, public library, museum (Longchamps), a few hospitals, and a custom-house; its lazaretto is very large. It is a military place of the fourth class, is defended by a citadel, by Fort St. Jean and Fort St. Nicolas, and the road is defended by the fortified islands Château d'If, formerly a state prison, Pomègue, and Ratanneau. It has a tribunal of commerce, a national academy of sciences, letters, and arts, an academy of medicine, and many other learned societies; a national college, with a library of 100,000 vols.; a school of hydrography, an astronomical observatory, a botanic garden, many benevolent institutions, several museums, and a mint. There are numerous fountains in the old and new town, and an abundant supply of water is brought from the Durance by means of a canal. M. is the most important seaport in France. The old harbour, running into the heart of the town, and with a narrow entrance, admitting only one vessel at a time, is commanded on the S. by the hill called Notre Dame de la Garde. To the N. the roadstead is now bordered by a series of wet docks, the principal being the Bassin de la Joliette and the Bassin National, protected by an immense breakwater 7220 ft. long. Altogether, the harbour accommodation now exceeds 430 ac., with more than 10 m. of quayage. There are also several dry docks (the largest 594 ft. long, and 25.8 ft. deep on sill), and a wooden floating dock. M. is the seat of the great shipping company known as the Messageries Maritimes, founded in 1852, chiefly for trade with Algeria and other parts of the Mediterranean, but now running lines also to the Black Sea, India, China, Japan, Australia, and the French possessions in the S. Pacific, E. and W. Africa. The principal imports in quantity are grain, coal, and oil-seeds; in value, raw silk, cocoons, and silk waste, grain, raw sugar, oil-seeds, hides and skins, cottons — the total value about £50,000,000; principal exports, manufactured goods (silks and other textiles), grain, wine, &c., the total value about £35,000,000. (See Appendix, p. 13.) The large import of oil-seeds places soap-works at the head of the manufacturing industries of M.; among others of importance are oil and sugar refineries, flour-mills, iron-works, including blast-furnaces, &c. Shipbuilding is also carried on. Birthplace of the astronomer Pytheas, the preacher Mascaron, and the sculptor Puget. M., founded by the Phocœans B.C. 600, served as a refuge for them from the vengeance of Cyrus. It soon became the entrepôt for all the surrounding countries, founded many colonies, was long celebrated for the cultivation of letters and arts, preserved its liberty under the Romans, and often acted as an independent republic. Louis XI. united it to the crown of France in 1481. It suffered severe ravages from the Plague in 1720; about 40,000 or 50,000 persons were carried off. Mean temp., yr. 57.5° F., Jan. 44.2°, July 72.0°. Mean rfall. 20.08 in. P. comm., which is one of the largest in France, embracing 55,170 ac. (1872) 313,000; city, 236,000; (1891) 404,000.

Martinique (corruption of the Carib name Madinina), French W. Indian isl., crossed in the middle by 14° 40′ N. and 61° W.; mountainous, and containing several extinct volcanoes; highest point Mt. Pelée; alt. 4430 ft. (cultivated to a height of 2500 ft.). The rivers are numerous, small, and rapid. Soil fertile; climate moist; unhealthy for Europeans. In the first century of French occupation the French population was reduced by one-third. Of the total area (380 sq. m.), uncleared land occupies 215 sq. m., cleared 162 sq. m. There is much dense forest. The principal products are sugar, fruit, and vegetables, cacao, coffee (formerly important), and cotton. Tobacco is also cultivated on a small scale. A poisonous serpent (Trigonocephalus lanceolatus) abounds in the forests and sugar plantations, and serves as a destroyer of the rats that infest the sugar-canes. The bite is not invariably fatal. The plains of the island are subject to inundation from tidal bores; hurricanes are also frequent (great hurricane in 1780), and earthquakes occur almost yearly. The cap. is Fort-de-France, but is second in importance to St. Pierre. These towns, united by a telegraph line, and communicating by submarine cable with the United States and S. America, are both on the W. ct., the latter, near the N. of the island, being the centre of commerce. M. is administered by a governor, a privy council, litigation council, and general council (elected by universal suffrage), who regulate taxation. It is also represented in France by a senator and two deputies. M. was discovered by the Spaniards in 1493. The French founded a colony on it in 1635. It was taken by the English in 1762, but resigned the following year; they again occupied it from 1794–1802, again in 1809, finally restoring it to France in 1816. P. (originally Carib) in 1888, 176,000 (mainly negroes and mulattoes).

Maryland, the most northerly of the S. Atlantic group of states, U.S., S. of Pennsylvania (the boundary between is the Mason and Dixon Line, lat. 39° 44′ N.). The state has about 33 m. of sandy coast on the Atlantic; but its harbours are reached by the Chesapeake Bay and its tribs., the Potomac on the S. boundary, the Patapsco, and the Susquehanna, which enters the head of the bay 120 m. from the S. boundary. Cap. Annapolis; other chief towns, Baltimore, the leading seaport, with nearly one-half the population of the state, Cumberland, Hagerstown, Frederick, Easton, Lonaconing, Cambridge, Frostburg, Havre de Grace. The western half of the state lies on the Appalachian ranges, through which the valley of the Potomac affords routes for railroad (Baltimore and Ohio) and canal. In the E. the state is a low plain, largely of aqueous deposits, sands, and clays, and divided by the Chesapeake Bay into the western shore and the eastern shore. The climate is mild and healthful, save for miasma in some of the low parts [Baltimore]. Good semi-bituminous coal is mined in Alleghany and Garrett counties. The iron ore mined, carbonates and brown hematites, is mostly used in the state. Other mineral products in smaller quantities are cement, slate, marble, granite, fireclay, and magnesite. The farm crops include maize, wheat, oats, potatoes, and tobacco. From the eastern shore many early vegetables and fruits are sent to northern cities, and great quantities are put up in tins. The tinning industry embraces also oysters, which are taken from Chesapeake Bay. The manufactures are principally clothing, flour, fertilisers, cotton goods, iron and steel, and tinware. Education is well provided for. The Johns Hopkins University is at Baltimore, United States Naval Academy at Annapolis. Founded under Catholic influences, M. has four Catholic colleges. The first settlement was made in 1634; Religious Toleration was enacted in 1649; M. was a slave state till 1863. Area, 12,210 sq. m. P. 1,042,390.

Masai, native race of E. equatorial Africa, ethnologically totally different from the Bantu and Negro races. The M. are very tall, and of lighter colour than the surrounding Bantus. They are nomadic herdsmen, hunters, and robbers, who are greatly dreaded by their neighbours. The M. are subdivided into a number of tribes or clans, without the slightest cohesion. War amongst themselves and with the Wakwafi (a degenerate sub-section of the M.) are of constant occurrence. See Masailand. (See Proc. R. G. S., 1891, pp. 193–208; Jackson and Gedge's Journey to Uganda viâ Masai-land.) [H. G. S.]

Masai-land, country in E. Africa, inhabited by the Masai. It is situated between 1° N. and 5° S. lat., and 35° and 38° E. long. According to Thomson, it is divided into two distinct regions, viz., the northerly or plateau region (alt. from 5000 to 9000 ft.), and the southerly or lower desert area (alt. from 3000 to 4000 ft.). Rainfall scanty, and almost entirely confined to the months of February, March, and April. In consequence of this many parts are practically desert, although the soil is naturally good. Climate dry and invigorating, and on the high plateaux comparatively cold. Volcanic activity in a very recent geological period has produced many of the peaks and mountain groups of Masai-land, e.g., the Kenia, Kinangop, Kilimanjaro, and Meru. (See J. Thomson, Through Masai-land, new ed., 1887; G. A. Fischer, Masai-land, 1885). [H. G. S.]

Oman, on S. ct. of Gulf of Oman, at farther end of a bay, closed in front by an island, and bordered E. and W. by steep rocks crowned with forts and a wall, which, however, are much dilapidated. It is a very important commercial centre owing to its position, which has made it a natural emporium between India, Arabia, and Persia. Its port has a depth of from 65 to 165 ft., and is well protected, except against the NW. and NE. winds. Exports dried fish, dates, and other fruit. It was taken by Albuquerque in 1507. Its climate is one of the hottest in the world. Just outside one of the forts is a salt marsh bordered by the huts of the poor, which gives rise to pestiferous exhalations, rendering remittent fever frequent. Mean temp. (3¾ yrs., 1872–73, 1884–85), yr. 80.6° F., Jan. 68.6°, July 88.3°. Population of different races, mostly Arabs.

Massabi, tn., W. Africa, French Congo Terr., on the coast, at the mouth of the Luemme, in 5° 4′ S.

Massac, co., U.S., Illinois, in extreme SE.

Massachusetts, one of the U.S., of the North Atlantic group, E. of New York, S. of Vermont and New Hampshire, having a coast-line, including Cape Cod Penin., of about 300 m. on the Atlantic. To M. belong the islands Martha's Vineyard and Nantucket. In the W. of the state are the low Taconic and Hoosac mountains ('the Berkshires'), with the fertile valley of the Housatonic between, and that of the Connecticut to the E. The Merrimac crosses the NE. corner. Little of the surface is level, nor is the soil rich. The climate is severe in winter, and changeable in summer, tending to affect the respiratory organs. [Boston, Springfield, Thatcher's Island, Wood's Hole]. Agriculture occupies less than one-tenth the population. The chief crops are maize, oats, potatoes, and tobacco, the last mentioned yielding up to a value of £40 per acre through great care in fertilising. Deep sea and coast fisheries yield cod, herring, halibut, mackerel, lobsters, oysters, clams, &c. Whaling vessels go out from New Bedford. One-half of the American fishing vessels go out from M. ports. Granite is extensively quarried in Essex co., and sandstone in Hampden co. Over one-half the pop. are engaged in manufactures—boots and shoes, cotton and woollen goods, iron and steel wares and machinery, leather, refined sugar, clothing, paper, &c.; and M. has proportionately the largest urban pop. of all the states. Much water-power is obtained from the Merrimac and other streams, but coal is brought from Pennsylvania by water and rail. Shipbuilding is carried on at Boston and Newburyport, pork-packing at Boston, and, as in Maine, ice is gathered in winter, and preserved for local use and for export. Commerce and transport occupy one-sixth of the pop., the export trade being second only to that of New York state. The Hoosac Tunnel made transportation to and from the West more easy, and much traffic comes from Canada viâ Montreal and viâ Halifax. M. stands high in educational matters; its school year among the longest, its percentage of attendance the highest, and its higher institutions take first rank. Harvard University is at Cambridge, near Boston; Hancock, Channing, Palfrey, Bancroft, Emerson, Holmes, Motley, and Lowell are among its graduates. The M. Institute of Technology is at Boston, the Andover Theological Seminary at Andover, Amherst College and the M. Agricultural College are at Amherst, Clark University is at Worcester. Wellesley College at Wellesley, Smith College at Northampton, and Radcliff College in Cambridge, are for women. The population of M. contains a large foreign-born element, increasing from 16 per cent. in 1850 to 29 per cent. in 1890, mainly of British subjects from Ireland and Canada. The earliest settlers were mainly British. In the 18th century M. was the leading colony of the North, as Virginia of the South. To-day its assessed valuation is the highest per capita in the Union, and third in absolute amount. M. was formed by the union in 1692 of two of the oldest English colonies in America—Plymouth, founded 1820, and Massachusetts Bay, 1628–30. Parts of Vermont and New Hampshire belonged to it for many years, and Maine was a part of it from 1651 to 1820. It was the leader in the revolutionary movement and in the anti-slavery agitation. Cap. and largest town, Boston; other leading towns, Worcester, Lowell, Fall River, Cambridge, Lynn, Lawrence, Springfield, New Bedford, Somerville, Holyoke, Salem, Chelsea, Haverhill, Brockton, Taunton, Gloucester, Newton, Malden, Fitchburg. Area, 8315 sq. m. P. 2,238,943.

Massaua, or Massowa, Abyssinian Mutugna, or Mutogna, called by the people of Tigre Baze, fortified seapt. tn., Africa, cap. of the Italian colony of Eritrea, connected with the mainland by an embankment 4920 ft. long, which contains the conduit by which water is conveyed into the town, on a sterile coral island in the Red Sea, 1 m. in circumference and 200 yards from the mainland, in 15° 36′ N., 39° 21′ E. The place of anchorage, the ancient Sabaïtikon, is formed by the deep channel stretching between the N. shore of the islet and the mainland. M. is surrounded by islets, which make navigation very difficult. It is a place of exchange for the products and merchandise of Abyssinia and the Sudan and those of India and Europe; chief trade in skins, butter, and mother-of-pearl. Formerly an Egyptian possession; taken by Italy in 1885. Dysentery and fever are prevalent. The name, a corruption of Medzaua, is believed by Egli to be derived from an Ethiopian word dzaua, 'to call,' and to refer to the fact that the island is 'within call' of the shore. Seat of Lazarists' mission. Mean temp. (2½ yrs., 1885–87), yr. 85.8° F., Feb. 77.3°, Aug. 94.3°. P. 20,000 (very mixed—mainly Arab; 600 Europeans).

Matabili, spelt by those who adhere to the English sound of e Matabele, Amandebele, important branch of the Zulu Kafirs. In 1827 they left Natal, and after having defeated the Mashona, Makalaka, and other tribes, they took possession of the rich plateaux and plains between the Zambezi and Limpopo. The M. are a warlike people, and chiefly engaged in hunting and raids on their neighbours. They own large flocks, although the tsetse fly (q.v.) prevents cattle-rearing in many districts. On account of their frequent invasions of Mashona-land (q.v.) war broke out in Oct. 1893 between the Chartered Company's forces and the M., which ended in the total defeat of the latter, and the capture of Buluwayo (2nd Nov. 1893). [H. G. S.]

Matabili-land, country in the interior of SE. Africa, inhabited by the Matabili (q.v.). It forms part of British Zambezia, and consists of rich and fertile plateaux and plains divided by the Matoppo and Izimunte Mts., which traverse the country from SW. to NE. The principal rivers of Matabili-land take their rise in these mountains, viz., Shashi, Sabi, and its tribs., Gway, Umnyati, Umfuli, and Ganyana. The slopes of the hills and mountains are rich in valuable minerals, especially gold. The country is well adapted for the cultivation of cereals, sugar, and cotton, and those parts which are free from the tsetse fly (q.v.) are especially suited for cattle-rearing and sheep-breeding. The climate is more or less unhealthy to Europeans, except in the highest dists. The cap. of Matabili-land is Buluwayo. Area estimated at 100,000 sq. m.; pop. at 200,000. (See Proc. R. G. S., 1891, pp. 1–21; Maund, Matabili- and Mashona-lands; Geog. Jour., i. (1893), pp. 289-324; Selous, Twenty Years in Zambesia.) [H. G. S.]

Mauritius, long known also as the Isle of France, island colony of Great Britain, about two and a half times the size of Anglesey, in the Indian Ocean, 600 m. E. of Madagascar, and 1500 m. E. of the coast of Africa, on the same parallel as Sofala Bay, 11,000 m. from England, and 2300 m. from Cape Town, lat. 20° 10′ S., long. 57° 35′ E. Coasts abrupt, surrounded by reefs; interior mountainous, and thickly wooded; highest peak, Piton de la Riviere Noire, 2711 ft., nearly equalled in height by Pieter Both and the Pouce. Streams numerous, flowing in deep ravines, occasionally forming fine cascades; none navigable more than a few hundred yards from the sea. Climate formerly reputed healthy; but in 1866–68 the lowlands round the coast were visited by severe epidemics of malarial fever, and since then malarial fever has been endemic everywhere below 500 or 600 ft., and in some places at a higher elevation. The island is situated in the hurricane region of the Indian Ocean, and is subjected to devastating storms. The hurricane season lasts from December to the second week in April. The terrific hurricane of 29th April 1892, which wrought tremendous damage in Port Louis, was the latest on record as regards the time of year of its occurrence. Soil rich in the valleys, producing wheat, maize, yams, and manioc, but principally sugar, which was introduced under the French governor Mahe de Labourdonnais (1735–46), and now yields 90 per cent. of the value of the exports. Among other exports, in order of value, are rum, aloe fibre, coco-nut oil, and vanilla. Total annual value of exports, £1,500,000–£2,500,000. Principal imports, rice and other grain, coal, cotton and other manufactures, including machinery. Experiments are being made with tea-cultivation. Most of the labouring population are Indian coolies or of Indian origin. The government, which extends over Rodrigues, the Amirantes group, the Seychelles, the St. Brandon or Cargados group, the Cosmoledo Is., the Chagos Is., and the Eagle Is., is vested in a governor, an executive council of five officials, and a legislative council of twenty-seven members, of whom eight ex officio, nine nominated by the governor, and ten elected. The island is subdivided into nine districts, cap. Port Louis (NW. coast), which is connected by rail by way of Curepipe (q.v.) with Souillac, on the S. coast, and Mahebourg on the SE. coast, and by a northerly route with Grand River (Grande Rivière) on the E. coast, as well as with the interior. Since Nov. 25, 1893, the island has been connected by cable with Europe by the Seychelles, Zanzibar, and Aden. French is spoken all over the island, but English is used in the courts of justice. Accounts are kept in rupees and cents of a rupee. The metric system of weights and measures came into force on 1st May 1878. The island was discovered by the Portuguese early in the 16th century, apparently by Diego Fernandez Pereira in Feb. 1607, and being identified with the Cerne of Pliny, was at first called Ilha do Cerne, afterwards Diego Rodrigos. It received its present name in honour of Prince Maurice when it was taken possession of in 1598 by the Dutch, who in 1638 made their first settlement here and founded a fort. Abandoned by the Dutch in 1710, it was taken possession of by the French (whence its name of Isle of France); captured by the British in 1810, and its possession ratified to them by the treaty of Paris, 1814. It is the scene of Bernardin St. Pierre's tale of Paul and Virginia. There is communication monthly between the island and Ceylon. Length, 39 m.; breadth, 28 m.; area, 708 sq. m. Mean temp. (Port Louis), yr. 74.2° F., Jan. 79.0°, July 68.9°; (Beau Séjour, alt. 970 ft.), yr. 72.1° F., Jan. 76.3°, July 67.2°. P. Mayenne, dep., W. France, traversed mainly N. to S. by the Mayenne, formed in 1790 out of parts of Maine and Anjou (about four-fifths from the former), divided into three arrs.: Laval (cap.), Château-Gontier, and Mayenne. Numerous ranges of hills (mean alt. 260–330 ft.), with intervening fertile valleys extending in every direction. In the S. is a series of plateaux descending by gentle slopes to the plain; northward the elevation increases, and the hills rise more abruptly. Highest point in the dep., and in the whole NW. of France, Mont des Avaloirs (1370 ft.), on the frontier of Orne. Primary rocks predominate. The dep. belongs chiefly to the basin of the Loire by the Mayenne and Sarthe; the NW. is drained by small affluents of the Vilaine and the Sélune. About one-third of the dep. is under wood; principal forests, E., Monaye, Multonne, Pail, Sillé; W., Mayenne, Concise, &c. Climate mild and humid. Cereals are cultivated in all parts, the principal are wheat and barley; apples for cider are extensively grown. Coal is worked to a limited extent in the W. (Pierre-la-Cour); there are quarries of marble, building stone, and slate. Manufactures are of little importance. Area, 1987 sq. m. P. (1891) 332,400. See France, table.

Mayenne, riv., France, rises in the W. part of dep. Orne, flows S. through deps. M. and Maine-et-Loire, and joins the Loiret on the right near Angers. Length 120–125 m., for 78 of which it is navigable (from Brives) with the help of 48 locks.

[1] Exclusive of 42,601 ac. under the larger rivers, lakes, and tideways.

The part of the county E. of the lakes, as well as that in the N. lying immediately to the W. of Killala Bay, belonging mainly to the Carboniferous Limestone, is fairly level and productive; but in the flat country bordering on Loughs Mask and Carra there are many miles of ground so rocky as to seem at a distance like an immense sheet of white stone. S. of Killala Bay a band of bleak and barren mountain land, about 7 m. broad, stretches from the Ox Mts. of Sligo W. to the shores of Erris. Almost the whole of the western part of the county, including the picturesque island of Achill, consisting mainly of crystalline rocks of Silurian age, is an immense mass of mountain and bog very difficult of access (highest peaks—Muilrea, 2688 ft.; Nephin, 2646 ft.; Croagh Patrick, 2370 ft.), and contains some of the most severely 'congested' dists. in Ireland (q.v.). Lakes—Corrib, Mask, Conn, and Carra. Rivers—Moy, Gwishenden, Ailie, Owenmore, &c. The soil is mainly limestone, with much iron ore in some parts, and excellent slate; also coal (at Stralaghy) and marble. The industries are cattle-rearing, agriculture (see Appendix, pp. 10–12), and fisheries; some linen manufacture. Chief towns, Ballina, Westport, Castlebar, and Ballinrobe; no others with more than 2000 inhabitants. There are remains of many ancient monasteries, and four round towers. The Midland Great Western Rly. runs from E. to W. through the southern half of the county to Westport and Newport, and is joined at Claremorris by the northern continuation of the Waterford and Limerick Rly. M. returns four M.P.'s, one for each county div. P. (1891) 219,034. See Ireland, table.

[1] Exclusive of 1629 ac. under the larger rivers and lakes.

The surface is generally level, with some heights towards W. and NW., and forms part of the great carboniferous limestone plain of Ireland, overlain however with glacial drift. The soil is very fertile, being in most parts a rich loam, in others sandy. Except in the N., where corn and green crops are extensively grown, the staple industry is grazing cattle for the English market. (For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 10–12.) The chief rivers are the Boyne (cutting the county into equal parts) and its trib., the Blackwater. The Royal Canal forms the southern border of M., which is also served by the Dublin and Meath Rly., and the Midland Great Western Rly. In ancient times the prov. or sub-kingdom of M., extended from the Shannon to the Irish Sea, and included Westmeath together with portions of Dublin, Kildare, King's County, Longford, Monaghan, and Armagh, Tara being the royal seat; and round towers (Kells and Donoughmore), sculptured crosses, and monastic ruins still remain. The county returns two members to Parliament (divs. N. and S.), and is in M. diocese, with portions in Armagh and Kilmore. Navan, Kells, and Trim are the only towns (1891) of P. <1000; assizes held at Trim, the county town. P. (1891) 76,990. See Ireland, table.

Mecca, city, Arabia, cap. prov. Hejaz, dist. Belud-ul-Haram, one of the two holy cities of the Mohammedans, situated in a valley about 800 paces broad, running N. to S. then SW., in 21° 28′ N., 40° 15′ E. It has several mosques, and a temple which surrounds the Kaaba, a small square edifice, the foundation of which is attributed by the Mohammedans to Abraham. On one of its angles is the black stone, an object of veneration to all Mussulmans, who alone are privileged to enter the city, and who are expected to make a pilgrimage hither at least once in their lives. At the time of the pilgrimage M. presents the appearance of an immense fair, where are assembled Malays, Tartars, Persians, Arabians, Turks, Africans, and others, who repair to the holy Mount Arafat, 3 m. distant, on which Mohammed prayed. The number of pilgrims has greatly decreased of late years, and the population of M. is becoming less in proportion. It has no industry; the only manufactures are of chaplets. Provisions, and even water, are imported from a distance. The famous balm of M. is brought from the interior of Arabia. M. is the birthplace of Mohammed, and the cradle of the Mussulman creed. It was taken by the Wahabis in 1803, but restored to the Pasha of Egypt (Mehemet Ali) in 1833, whose son Ibrahim became Sheik El Haram. Since the time of the Abbaside Caliphs (8th century), unbelievers have been strictly prohibited from entering the city, but about fifteen Europeans at different times have succeeded in entering it, among others Richard (afterwards Sir R. F.) Burton in 1853, and Dr. C. Snouck Hurgronje in 1885, who estimated the population at 60,000.

Mecklenburg (named derived from Mikilinburg = large castle), country in N. Germany, consisting of two independent gd.-duchies, M.-Schwerin and M.-Strelitz, which form part of the German Empire. M.-Schwerin is situated between 53° 4′ and 54° 22′ N. lat., and 10° 36′ and 13° 11′ E. long.; there are also two enclaves in Brandenburg and one in M.-Strelitz. The second gd.-duchy, M.-Strelitz, consists of two parts, viz., the duchy of Strelitz and the principality of Ratzeburg. The former is situated between 53° 9′ and 53° 7′ N. lat., and 12° 40′ and 13° 57′ E. long.; and the latter between 53° 40′ and 53° 54′ N. lat., and 10° 45′ and 11° 5′ E. long. As both gd.-duchies represent a physical and ethnographical unity, they are treated together in this article. M. is situated between the Oder and the Elbe, and forms part of the N. German Plain. The country is, however, not altogether flat, being traversed by the Baltic Lake Plateau (q.v.), with its numerous lakes. The rivers of M. flow partly to the Baltic, partly to the Elbe. The most important of the former are the Warnow and Recknitz, whilst the Stecknitz, Sude, and Elde (q.v.) are tribs. of the Elbe. The Müritz Havel, the New Elde, the Friedrich Franz, and the New Canal are the most important canals. The climate of M. is moderate, and differs but little from that of other parts of N. Germany, the springs being cold and the summers temperate on account of the vicinity of the Baltic. M. is chiefly an agricultural country, 57 per cent. of the area of M.-Schwerin, and 48 per cent. of that of M.-Strelitz being arable land. The most fertile districts are the NW. parts of the country. Cereals are the principal produce, rye, wheat, barley, and oats yielding large crops. The cultivation of potatoes, beet-root, flax, and hemp is likewise of very great importance. Cattle-rearing, sheep and pig breeding are also in a flourishing state, and the M. breeds of horses are renowned for their strength and endurance. Forests abounding in game cover 19 per cent. of the surface of M. They are scattered over the country, but are most extensive in the S. of M.-Strelitz, and the part of M.-Schwerin N., NE., and NW. of the Plauer-See (Lake of Plau). The numerous lakes and rivers abound in fish, and fishing is a remunerative occupation for many of the inhabitants. The mineral production of M. is very limited. Lignite is found near Malliss, salt at Sülze, and gypsum at Lübtheen. The Baltic Sea and the Müritz Lake [Baltic Lake Plateau] yield amber. Peat occurs in large quantities, but its use is limited. The industries of M. are in a backward state, spirits, beer, beet-sugar, cigars, textiles, and machinery being the only manufactures worth mentioning. Agricultural products, cattle, horses, sheep, and wool are exported in large quantities; while coal, iron, sugar, salt, wine, beer, and manufactures are the principal imports. The chief towns and trading places are Schwerin, Wismar, Rostock, Güstrow, Old and New Strelitz, and New Brandenburg. The population consists of two elements: the nobility and the inhabitants of the towns are mostly Germans (Low Saxonian tribe), whilst the peasants are Germanised Slavs. German is spoken everywhere, the Low German dialect prevailing. The majority of the inhabitants are Protestants. The original inhabitants of M. were the Vandals, who left the shores of the Baltic during the Peoples' Migration. In the 6th century the country was occupied by Slav tribes (Obotrites, Leutitians, Redarians), and it was only after a great many efforts of various German emperors and princes that the country was finally reconquered by the Germans in the middle of the 12th century, and from that time M. belonged to the old German Empire until the dissolution of the latter in 1806. Both duchies took part in the Confederation of the Rhine in 1808, were made gd.-duchies in 1815, and joined the new German Empire in 1871. Area of M.-Schwerin 5080 sq. m., P. (1890) 578,000; area of M.-Strelitz 1131 sq. m., P. (1890) 98,000. [H. G. S.]

Medina, in composition Medinet, Arabic, 'city' or 'metropolis.' Frequent in Spanish place-names, which contain also Spanish elements.

Medi'na, Arab Medinet-al-Nabi, one of the holy cities of the Mohammedans, Arabia, in the Hejaz, 255 m. N. Mecca, and 240 m. NE. the port of Jedda, on the Red Sea; it is partly walled, and has a fort, the chief stronghold of the Hejaz, and is surrounded on three sides by mountains. Mohammed, driven from Mecca, fled to M. in 622, and from this epoch, called the Hejira or Hejra, the Mohammedans reckon dates. M. was the cap. of the Arabian empire under Mohammed, who died there in 632. The great mosque, Al Haram, on the reputed spot where Mohammed died, is smaller than that of Mecca, and there are several minor mosques, but no other public buildings. Alt. nearly 3310 ft. P. 15,000 (?).

Mediterranean Sea, the ancient Mare Internum, also the Great Sea of the Bible, an inland sea, enclosed E. by Asia, S. by Africa, and N. by Europe, communicating with the Atlantic on the W. by the Strait of Gibraltar, and with the Sea of Marmora on the NE. by the Dardanelles. The Tyrrhenian, Ionian, Adriatic, and Ægean Seas are branches separating the great peninsulas of southern Europe and Asia Minor. The M. receives the drainage of southern Europe, Asia Minor, and northern Africa. Principal rivers: Ebro, Rhone, Po, Arno, and Tiber in Europe, and Nile in Africa. The M. is divided into two sections, an E. and a W., by Italy, Sicily, and the submarine ridge called Adventure Bank, between Sicily and Cape Bon in Africa. The deep W. basin, over 1350 fathoms, extends between Sardinia and Corsica in the E. and the Balearic Is. in the W., stretching S. of the latter in an elongated triangle to the SE. of Cape Gata. This area is subdivided into two smaller depressions, respectively E. and S., of the Balearic Is., the greatest depth (1722 fathoms) being found W. of Sardinia. The deepest soundings in the M. (2406 fathoms) were found by the 'Pola' expedition in 1891 between Malta and Crete, in lat. 35° 44′ 20″ N., long. 21° 44′ 50″ E. This depression has been named the 'Pola Deep.' Another depression (2110 fathoms) occurs E. of Rhodes. If the surface of the M. were lowered 100 fathoms, Italy and Sicily would be united to Africa, and the Bosporus would be closed; if lowered 250 fathoms, the Strait of Gibraltar would be replaced by an isthmus; and if lowered 500 fathoms, the Balearic Is. would be united to Spain. The bottom configuration indicates that there must formerly have been continuous land between the N. and S. shores, and this is confirmed by the fossil remains of elephants, hippopotami, &c., found in Malta and Sicily. The salinity of the M. is greater than that of the ocean, owing to the excess of evaporation over precipitation and river supply (see Gibraltar, Strait of). The degree of salinity is most variable near the surface, less variable, but slightly higher, in the E. than in the W. basin. The average specific gravity is about 1.029, as compared with 1.028 in the Atlantic; it diminishes, as a rule, from the surface to a depth of about 800 or 1000 fathoms, and then increases towards the bottom. The waters of the M. are noted for their deep blue colour, and also, especially in the E., for great transparency. Temperature is subject to seasonal variations to a depth of about 50 fathoms; below this it is almost constant at 56° F., even to the greatest depths. This is in accordance with the general law as to temperature which prevails in basins cut off from free communication with the ocean. As to the climate generally, see Europe. Among local winds may be mentioned the mistral and bora, both strong, cold, dry, northerly winds, the former occurring from the mouth of the Ebro to Genoa, but prevailing especially round Marseilles, the latter (the bora) from Trieste along the whole coast of Dalmatia; the sirocco, a violent and dry, but hot, parching, and dust-laden southerly wind, experienced chiefly in Malta and Sicily, but occasionally as far N. as Rome; the leveche, a similar wind occurring on the SE. of Spain, occasionally, though seldom, as far W. as Malaga; the solano, generally a moist E. wind, visiting the same regions; and the etesian winds (called by the modern Greeks meltemia), northerly winds blowing in the eastern parts of the sea, chiefly in late summer and autumn. The M. is a nearly tideless sea. At Venice there is a rise of from 1 to 2 ft. in spring tides; but, except during the bora, the tides in the Adriatic are scarcely perceptible; at Zante the rise is less than 6 in. In many narrow channels and arms there is a sensible flow and ebb; but the only well-marked tidal phenomena are observed in the Lesser Syrtis, particularly at Jerba, where the rise and fall varies from 3 to 8 ft. As regards the fauna, a marked feature is the scarcity of life in the deeper parts; this desert character is attributed by Dr. Natterer to the want of circulation, and not to any deficiency in the chemical constituents of the waters. Other observations have suggested the theory that the scarcity of life is due to the absence of rocks or other inequalities to which the stationary forms might attach themselves, as cables, after lying for some time on the sea-floor, have been found covered with tubicular annelids, polyps, &c. Fish are abundant, especially tunny, anchovies, pilchards, and mackerel; and the finest coral and sponge are procured. The larger cetacea are occasionally met with. Since the opening of the Suez Canal, various molluscs, including the pearl oyster, have migrated inwards from the Red Sea. The fauna of the M. is similar in character to that of the neighbouring parts of the Atlantic Ocean. A large part of the sea-bottom is covered with a yellowish mud, but in some parts a crust, chiefly calcareous and siliceous, is formed, varying in thickness from 0.59 to 3.15 in. Greatest length on a line ESE., 2330 m.; breadth, on a meridian through Corsica and Sardinia, 495 m.; between Sicily and Cape Bon, 85 m.; including the Adriatic, 1,007,220 sq. m., excluding the Adriatic, 955,000 sq. m. (Strelbitsky). See Proc. R. G. S., 1890, p. 620; 1872, p. 121; 1877, map and text; Geog. Jour., vol. iii. p. 138; Bull. Soc. Geog. Paris, 1882, pp. 93–130, and map.

Mekong, riv., in the SE. of Asia, rises in the tableland of Tibet, precise source undetermined. Its headstream is probably the river which, after passing the town of Chiamdo, takes the name of Chiamdo-cher, and which flows nearly parallel to (S. and SW. of) the upper Yangtse-kiang. S. of 30° N. it is known as the Lantsan-kiang, and afterwards as the M. Its course N. of 25° 20′ N. lat., where it is crossed by an iron bridge on the great route from Bhamo to Tali-fu, is in great part unexplored, as also is its course from Sayang (6 m. S. of the bridge) down to about 21° N. Below Chien-hong it forms two series of rapids, then with many twistings describes a great bend E. to the neighbourhood of Luang Prabang, where, in about 20° N., having received on the l. bk. the Nam-u, it turns abruptly S. After passing Paklai it turns suddenly E. in about 18° N., and after flowing in that direction for two degrees it takes again a southerly course, in about 104° E., and continues that course to its mouth. Near Pnom-penh the river divides, one branch going NW. to the Tonle- (or Tale-) Sap, and forming sometimes a feeder and sometimes the outlet of the lake, while two other channels continue the southerly, or rather SE., course of the river, one of these (the W.) called the Posterior, or Inferior R., or the Bassak, the other the Anterior R., or Superior R., or sometimes the Mekong. The Posterior, or W. arm, is the shallower of the two, but is connected by two canals with ports on the SW. ct., one from Shodok (Chaudoc) to Hatien, the other from Long-Shuyen to Rachgia. Above Vinhlong the Anterior, or E. arm, again divides into several mouths (kwas), all of which are obstructed by bars. The deepest channel, that of Kwa-dai, passing Mytho (Mitho), ordinarily admits ships drawing 16 ft., or during the SW. monsoon 23–26 ft. The navigation of the middle and upper M. is obstructed by rapids in many places. They begin at Kratie, in about 12½° N., and continue thence up to Stung-treng, in about 13° 35′ N. (specially bad at Sambok and Sambor, a little above Kratie). Below Khong there is a series of bad rapids for 8 or 9 m., in about 14° N., and above these there is a navigable stretch of about 90 m. to the mouth of the Nam-Mun (15° 20′ N.). Above this the M. is navigable to Kemmarat (16° 4′ N.), and then for 230 m. to Nongkhai (on the W.–E. stretch below Paklai, in about 102° 40′ E.). Above that it is scarcely navigable at all, or only with difficulty to Chiengkan, about the place where the easterly course begins. Length about 2600 m.; area of basin estimated at from 350,000 to 400,000 sq. m.

Mekran, or Makran, maritime dist., partly in Persia, partly in Baluchistan, between 25° and 28° N. lat., 58° and 66° E. long., having W. the Persian prov. of Laristan, E. the Baluch provs. of Sarawan, Jhalawan, and Lus, S. the Indian Ocean, and N. a sandy desert and the Baluchi prov. of Kei. It is an arid and barren region, where the troops of Alexander the Great suffered severely on their return from India. The country bordering the Persian Gulf, between 62° and 67° E., is a bare desert, with low hills and a scanty supply of water. Dates grow in some of the valleys. M. is divided into petty dists. under separate chiefs.

Melamo, cape, Portuguese E. Africa, at the mouth of Fernão Veloso Bay, in 14° 25′ S., 40° 49′ E. (O'Neill).

Melanesia, general geographical name given to those groups of islands in the Western Pacific which lie between the equator on the N. and the Tropic of Capricorn on the S., and between New Guinea on the W. and the Fiji Is. on the E. The following archipelagoes, stretching on the whole from NW. to SE., are included under the designation—Admiralty, Bismarck, i.e., Neu-Mecklenburg (New Ireland) and Neu-Pommern (New Britain), D'Entrecasteaux, Louisiade, Solomon, Santa Cruz, New Hebrides, New Caledonia, Loyalty, Banks, and Fiji. The name is derived from the black colour of the prevailing race who inhabit them, namely, a branch of the Papuans. These people are long-headed (dolichocephalous) and short of stature, with thick frizzly hair and broad noses. Although they speak one common language, it is distinguished by great dialectical varieties. The people stand at a low level of civilisation, being treacherous, addicted to cannibalism, and often extremely rude in their manners, though they show considerable skill of an artistic kind. The islands are nearly all of volcanic origin, and rest on a coral base. Many of them have lagoons and reefs. Luxuriant vegetation clothes them as a rule from the summits of the lofty volcanic cones down to the water's edge. Rats, bats, flying-foxes, dogs, opossums, crocodiles, snakes, frogs, eels, mosquitoes, and innumerable birds are the principal representatives of animal life, though all these are not alike universally distributed throughout the different groups. For further particulars, consult the articles on the several archipelagoes, as well as Pacific, Papuas, Polynesia. See R. H. Codrington, The Melanesians, 1891.

Melbourne, city and seapt., cap. Victoria, Bourke co., 40 m. NE. by E. Geelong. The city proper stands chiefly on the N. bank of the Yarra, where it flows from E. to W., a little above its sharp bend S. before entering Hobson's Bay, at the head of Port Phillip Bay. Fine open suburbs, some immediately adjoining M. proper, lie on both sides the river. The appearance of M. answers to its rank. It was laid out at an early period of its history by men who understood the advantages of wide and straight streets and large open spaces. To this it owes its fine public parks and gardens, such as the Botanical Gardens, one of the most valuable in the world; the Royal Park, with a zoological collection; and others. The wide streets and the numerous open spaces afford admirable sites for the magnificent public buildings with which the city has since been adorned, and in the construction of which the builders have used an almost imperishable stone, locally known as 'bluestone.' Among these buildings may be mentioned the Parliament Houses, the Courts of Law, and Ormond College, belonging to the University. M. proper can be reached by the Yarra by vessels of considerable size, the sharp bend mentioned above being avoided by the new Coode Canal. Vessels drawing 16 ft. can get to M. on ordinary tides. Along the N. side of the Yarra is about one mile of wharfage, used principally by intercolonial traders and colliers, and on the opposite (S.) side a large stone pier. On the N. side, too, is a dry dock, which can accommodate vessels of 1100 tons; and a new wet dock is contemplated. Hobson's Bay, however, which has a depth of 18–30 ft. at low water, forms the harbour of M. for vessels of the largest size; and the port on the N. side of this bay, formerly called Sandridge, is now known as Port Melbourne, 2½ m. from M. Immediately opposite Port Melbourne, on the other side of Hobson's Bay, stands Williamstown, another suburban port, occupying a small penin. which juts out into Port Phillip Bay, and terminates in Gellibrand Point. In this outer harbour, chiefly at Port Melbourne and Williamstown, there are 23,888 ft. of berthing, ranging in depth from 6 to 27 ft. at low water. Spring tides rise 2 ft. 8 in. throughout the harbour. On the shore of Port Phillip Bay, to the SE. of M., are the two suburbs of St. Kilda and Brighton, which possess a fine sandy beach, and are hence favourite watering-places, and full of country houses belonging to the richer inhabitants of the capital. M. was named after Lord Melbourne, the premier of the United Kingdom (1835–41), at the date of its foundation. Mean temp., yr. 57.2° F., Jan. 65.9°, July 47.2°; rfall. (18 yrs.), 26.6 in. P. city proper (1881) nearly 70,000; (1891) 73,400; including a radius of 10 m. (1887) 372,000; (1891) 490,900.

Mêlos, or Milo, one of the Cyclades, isl. in Ægean Sea, belonging to Greece, crossed by 36° 45′ N. and 24° 26′ E., is an oblong in shape, 14 m. E. to W., and 8 m. N. to S., with a deep indentation from the N., and is of volcanic origin, rising to 2548 ft. in Mount Prophet Elias, whilst there are at least four other peaks exceeding 1000 ft. The island, which consists principally of primitive gneiss and mica schist overlaid by trachytic eruptive rocks, is rich in minerals—sulphur in the SE. (2000 tons annually), manganese (18,000), gypsum, salt, millstones, and argentiferous barytes at Vani and Triades in the NW., and Mirovilia and Pironisi in the NE. Lead, zinc, copper, and alum also occur, but are not worked. The sulphur, alum, clay, and obsidian of M. were well known to the ancients. Sulphur springs and caves abound. Cap. Kastro (called also Plaka), near which ruins and catacombs of ancient city of M., where painted vases, &c., and famous Venus of Milo, were discovered. Area, 57 sq. m. (Strelbitsky); 63 sq. m. (Wisotzki). P. 4959. M. has three dependent islands—Anti-Mêlos, Kimolos, and Polinos.

Memel, or Niemen, in Russian Nyeman (Chronus of antiquity), river in eastern Europe, rises in the Russian govt. of Minsk, flows on the whole W. to Grodno, then turns N. (separating the govt. of Vilna from the Polish govt. of Suwałki), and again W. above Kovno (separating govts. Kovno and Suwałki), and continues W., flowing through the Prussian prov. of E. Prussia into the Kurisches Haff, which it enters by two main arms, into which it divides a few miles below Tilsit, the Gilge flowing to the SW., and the Russ to the NW.; the Russ again dividing at the town of Russ into the Skirwieth and the Atmath, the latter of which enters the Kurisches Haff opposite the mouth of the Minge; navigable from Pyasechna, 475 m. from the mouth of the Atmath; but with several obstructions to navigation in the upper part of its course, one of which, known as the 'Devil's Dam,' a natural accumulation of large stones in the bed of the river, occurs about 15 m. above Kovno, in consequence of which German boats seldom ascend beyond that town, 125 m. above the mouth of the Atmath. The Gilge mouth is connected by the Friedrichsgraben with the Deime, and by means of that river with the Pregel at Tapiau. From the mouth of the Atmath navigation is continued by means of the Minge and the König Wilhelm's Canal to Memel, 33 m. from the mouth of the Atmath. In Russia its most important tribs. are: (1) Szczara, which it receives from the SE. on the l. bk. about 445 m. above Grodno, and is connected by means of the Oginsky Canal with the Yatsolda R., which enters the Pripet below Pinsk; and (2) the Viliya, which it receives from the E. on the r. bk. at Kovno. Considerable shipping of corn, linseed, flax, and timber exported from Russia; and salt, fish, and colonial wares imported. Total length, 565 m.; basin, 34,962 sq. m. (Strelbitsky).

NE. of the SW. corner of the state, 780 m. above New Orleans, 450 m. below St. Louis, and the most important city between these two. Carries on an immense trade both by rail and river, exporting principally cotton. Has numerous cotton-seed oil-mills, some very large foundries, machine and wood works, &c. About 1780 the site was owned by the Chickasaw Indians. M. was laid out in 1820, and incorporated as a city in 1826. Several visitations of yellow fever and other infectious diseases reduced the city to bankruptcy in 1879, but it has since recovered its prosperity, and sanitary reforms have made it one of the healthiest cities in the U.S. The Mississippi is now spanned here by a bridge 60 ft. above high water (the lowest bridge on the river). Alt. (city base) 117 ft. (City Engineer); 227–244 ft. (R.R.); signal stn. 321 ft. (U.S. Signal Office). Mean temp., yr. 61.2° F., Jan. 40.4°, July 80.9°; rfall. (13 yrs.), 56.1 in. P. Menam ('the mother of waters'), or Meplug, riv., Siam, rises in the Shan Mts. near the Burmese frontier, and is known as the Mekiang down to 19° 22′ lat. N., thence it bears the name of Meping, and flows S. between steep forest-covered mountains to Mutka, below which it forms a series of rapids extending over about 50 m. Above Raheng it receives on the l. bk. the Menamwang or Mevan; lower it turns SE. to Paknam, where it receives on the l. bk. the Menam-Phe or Lesser Menam (300 m.), formerly regarded as one of its headstreams. The course becomes again S., and near Chainat the river divides into two principal and several secondary branches, enclosing a delta 120 m. in length. The W. arm, called the Supanbari or Taching, is connected with the E. arm, the Menam, by four canals. The M. receives at Ayuthia the Namsak (l. bk.), and 50 m. lower down passes Bangkok, 19 m. below which it falls into the Gulf of Siam, after a course of more than 750 m. The approach to the mouth is obstructed by sandbanks, and large vessels have to anchor at a distance of 10 m. M. is navigable for small boats to Chieng-mai, 75 m. above Mutka, and for river steamers to Paknam. The river overflows its banks every summer, the water inundating the rice-fields from the end of August to the beginning of November.

Merthyr-Tydfil, or Merthyr-Tydvil, parl. bor., market-tn., and par. of S. Wales, co. Glamorgan, on the Taff, 24 m. by rail (Taff Vale Rly.) NW. Cardiff, with which it is also connected by canal. Its railway station is the common terminus of the L. & NW. R., G. W. R., Brecon & Merthyr Rly., Rhymney Rly., and Taff Vale Rly. It has rather narrow streets, and stands in a bare situation surrounded by lofty hills, near the centre of the great S. Wales coal basin; hence the numerous collieries and the great steel-works of Dowlais and Cyfarthfa. The produce of these is mostly shipped at Cardiff. The place owes its origin as an 'iron' centre to the foresight of one Anthony Bacon, who in 1765 took a century's lease of the minerals around what was then the insignificant hamlet of M.-T. There he erected iron-works, and when he retired from business in 1782 he divided and sub-let his mineral concession in four separate parts—Dowlais, Penydarran, Cyfertha (Cyfarthfa, Cyvarthva), and Plymouth works (Smiles). The sanitary condition of the place has been materially improved since the middle of the 19th century by extensive drainage and water-works. The bor. is under the superintendence of a high constable, and sends two members to House of Commons. The first iron tramway in the country, for which an Act of Parliament was obtained, was laid down in 1796 from Merthyr to Navigation (nearly half-way to Cardiff). On this Trevithick ran the first locomotive in 1804. Market-days, W. and S. 17,400 ac. Par. and tn. P. (1801) 1250; (1890) 58,100; parl. bor. P. (1851) 63,100; (1871) 51,900; (1891) 104,400.

Meshed, more properly Mash-had ('saint's tomb'), or Mushed, tn., in the NE. of Persia, cap. prov. Khorassan, 195 m. NW. Herat (Afghanistan), connected by carriage road of 230 m. with Herat and in other direction with Kuchan. It stands in a fertile plain, is enclosed by walls, and has the magnificent mausoleum of the eighth imám, Rezá, with a library containing 1041 Korans. The inhabitants trade in carpets, arms, worked metals, and black vases of steatite, and carry on an active trade with Bukhara, Kandahar, Herat, and Yezd. The shrine is visited annually by nearly 100,000 pilgrims. The mosque is the richest in the world of the Shiah sect of Mohammedans (the sect to which most of the Persians belong), and has two minarets; the doors are studded with rubies, and covered with gold. Near it is a large plain studded with the ruins of the ancient Pasagardæ, where was the tomb of Cyrus. Amongst many interesting monuments are the ruins of a palace supposed to have been that of Cyrus. 'The average health of M. is superior to that of many Persian towns' (Curzon). Imám Rezá dome, lat. 36° 17′ 19.5″ N., long. 59° 36′ 14.4″ E. (Proc. R. G. S., 1885, pp. 735–37). Alt. 3100 ft. (Curzon, Persia, vol. i., p. 153), 3197 ft. (Curzon, map). Messi'na, ancient Greek Zankle, Latin Messana, city and seapt., Sicily, cap. prov. M., on the Strait of Messina, 8 m. NW. by N. Reggio, in 38° 11′ N., 15° 34′ E. A railway line running along the E. ct. of the island connects M. with Syracuse; another along the N. ct., destined ultimately to communicate with Palermo, reached in 1892 to Patti, a distance of 43 m. M. stretches from the harbour back up the slopes of lofty hills, which shut it in on the W. It has wide streets, paved with lava, and adorned with fountains, a cathedral dating from Norman times (11th and 12th century), a viceroy's palace, a university (founded 1549) with twenty ordinary and seventeen extra-ordinary professors, a public library, and several handsome private palaces. A monument to the Emperor Conrad IV. stands in the cathedral, and another to Don John of Austria in one of the squares. The port, protected by outlying forts, is formed by a tongue of land projecting NE. and curving westward in the form of a sickle, whence its ancient Greek name. It has a water area of 193 ac.; depth at entrance of 59–184 ft.; length of quayage, 5906 ft.; depth at quayside, 22.9–82 ft.; and is easy of access for steamers, but not for sailing vessels. The depth varies 1.6 ft. There are three lighthouses, visible respectively 11, 10, and 6 m. Exports comprise oranges and lemons, olive-oil, wine, fruit essences, argol, wine lees; average value nearly one and a half millions sterling. The lemons grown in the neighbourhood are of especially fine quality. M. carries on active tunny and other fisheries, and manufactures muslin, linen, silk stuffs, coral ornaments, and lemon and other fruit essences. M. was founded by Greeks in 740 B.C., destroyed by the Carthaginians in 396 B.C., became Roman in 241 B.C., was conquered by the Saracens in 831, ruled by the Normans from 1061 to 1194, and from 1282 to 1713 it was a Spanish possession. It was ravaged by the Plague in 1743, by an earthquake in 1783, and by an inundation in 1823. Civil strife filled its streets in 1848 and 1860. Mean temp., yr. 65.7° F., Jan. 53.2°, Aug. 80.6°. City P. (1881) 78,400; (1891) estimated at 89,000; comm. P. (1881) 126,400; (1891) estimated at 142,500.

Messina, Strait of, or Faro di Messina, ancient Mamertinum Fretum, separates Sicily from Italy. Length, 24 m.; breadth, 2½ m. in N. to 12 m. in S. Here are the dreaded Scylla and Charybdis of ancient mythology and later proverb; the former a gneiss rock off the little town of Scylla on the Calabrian coast of Italy, the latter a whirlpool, or rather rapid, in front of the harbour of Messina. The physical facts underlying the tradition are these: the speed of the tides varies greatly in places, from 3 to 11 m. an hour, the variations being principally due to a submarine ledge 400 ft. below the surface (elsewhere 820 ft.) which runs obliquely across from Punta del Pezzo (Calabrie) to Sta. Agatha. Hence arise rapids, races, or whirlpools. Two spots are particularly dangerous to small coasters: (1) a whirlpool opposite the harbour of M., with spring tides and a SE. wind; (2) at Faro, whence vessels are frequently torn from their anchors and driven on to the Calabrian coast at Torre Cavallo, i.e., Punta del Pezzo or Scilla.

Metz, tn. and first-class fortress, Ger., Alsace-Lorraine, cap. circle M., on the Moselle R., chiefly on the r. bk., 31 m. N. Nancy (Fr.). It has a Gothic cathedral, chiefly 13th century; a museum, with a natural history collection, picture gallery, and library; and public monuments to the French generals Ney and Fabert, and the Germans Bismarck, Moltke, Emperor William I., and the slain (1870–71) belonging to the 1st Prussian army corps. Leather is tanned and manufactured. There is considerable trade by river. The vicinity is famous for its fruit, vegetables, and wine. The town (Gallic) was called Divodurum and Mediomatrica (whence Mettis, Metz) by the Romans; it was, as Mettis, the cap. of Frankish Austrasia; and in 843 became cap. of Lorraine. In 1552 it was betrayed to the French, nor could the Emperor Charles V. recover it, though he invested it for nearly three months. It remained French down to 1870. The place was fortified by the Romans; but it was the French who made it a modern fortress, by building its walls in 1550 and the citadel in 1562, by reconstructing its defensive works on Vauban's plans in 1674, and by adding forts in 1728–31, and again from 1867. After several fierce battles round the city in August and September 1870, Marshal Bazaine was shut up within its fortifications, and surrendered with close upon 180,000 men on 29th October following. Since it became German its forts have been greatly strengthened. Natives of M.—Generals Fabert, Custance, and Kellermann. Alt. 594 ft. Rfall. (32 yrs.), 25.52 in. P. (1871) 51,300; (1891) 60,200. At the time of the French capture in 1552 the population was 60,000, but most of them emigrated to Germany, and in 1698 the population was only 22,000.

Meurthe, riv., France, rises in the Vosges, SE. St. Dié, passes St. Dié, Lunéville, and Nancy, where it becomes navigable. It joins the Moselle on the right at Frouard, 6 m. N. Nancy. Length 100 m., of which 73 m. are navigable for rafts.

Meurthe-et-Moselle, dep., NE. France, traversed SE. to NW. by the Meurthe, and S. to N. by the Moselle; formed in 1871 of parts of the two deps. not ceded to Germany, the original deps. having been formed in 1790 partly from Lorraine and partly from the bishopries of Metz, Toul, and Verdun; divided into four arrs.: Nancy (cap.), Briey, Lunéville, Toul. The dep. is somewhat triangular in form, broadest in S.; the arr. of Briey, in the N., is connected with the S. by a narrow neck at Chambley. Surface hilly (985–1310 ft.), with many wide fertile valleys; mountainous in the SE., where the forest-covered Vosges rise to 2625–2955 ft. on the borders of Alsace-Lorraine; further N. the elevation declines; N. and NW. of Lunéville is a rich saliferous tract of about 154 sq. m.; between the Meurthe and Moselle is a plateau, in which open deep, narrow valleys, locally known as 'fonds.' The prevailing geological formations in order from E. to W. are Trias, Lias, and Oolite. The dep. belongs to the basin of the Rhine; tribs, of Moselle, r. bk. Meurthe and Seille (latter joins outside the dep.), l. bk. Madon; affluents of Meurthe, r. bk. Vezonze, l. bk. Mortagne. Forests cover nearly one-fourth of the surface (Haye, Parroy, Vosges, Moudons, &c.). Climate variable, dry [Nancy]. Principal cereals, wheat and oats; the vine flourishes, the production of wine per acre being between two and three times the average for France; hops (Lunéville). Principal minerals, iron (Nancy, Longwy, &c.) and rock-salt (Saint-Nicolas, Varangeville), in both of which the dep. is exceedingly rich, the former supplying more than two-thirds and the latter three-fourths of the respective total production of France. The metallurgical industries are very important; more than half the cast iron of France is manufactured in the dep. (Nancy, Longwy), sheet iron (Pompey), steel railway materials, &c.; other extensive manufactures are earthenware and glass; Baccarat is noted for artistic fancy glass. Area, 2037 sq. m. P. (1891) 444,200. See France, table.

Meuse, dep., NE. France, traversed from SSE. to NNW. by the Meuse; formed in 1790 from Lorraine (about two-thirds), Trois Evêchés, Clermontois, and Champagne; divided into four arrs.: Bar-le-duc (cap.), Commercy, Montmédy, Verdun-sur-Meuse. The surface consists of a series of plateaux, mainly of Oolitic formations, Cretaceous in SW.; elevation generally increases from N. to S.; lowest (375 ft.) in SW., at exit of Saulx; traversed by several ranges of hills; connected S. with the Langres plateau and N. with the Ardennes. The principal range running SE. and NW. forms the watershed between the basins of Rhine and Seine; culminating point, Buisson d'Amanty (1390 ft.); the N. portion of this range, called the western Argonne, is covered with magnificent forests; the eastern Argonne, on r. bk. of Meuse, is little inferior in elevation (1350 ft.). Along the left foot of this range extends the slightly undulating and fertile plateau of Woëvre (655–820 ft.). The dep. is drained partly to the Rhine (nearly two-thirds) and partly to the Seine; the Meuse, which receives on r. bk. the Othain, is navigable in conjunction with the Canal de l'Est to near Void for vessels drawing 6½ ft.; the Moselle does not enter the dep., but receives several streams from the E.; the Saulx and Ornain flow in the SW. to the Marne, which just touches the dep.; the NW. dist. is drained by the Aisne and Aire flowing to the Oise. Forests cover nearly one-fourth of the surface. The principal cereals are wheat and oats; vineyards cover many of the hill slopes, and wine of good quality is produced. Minerals are of little importance. Manufactures are limited. Area, 2409 sq. m. P. (1891) 292,300. See France, table.

Meuse (Flemish Maes, Dutch Maas, Walloon Mouse, ancient Mosa), riv., rises in France, dep. Haute-Marne, 16 m. NE. Langres, traverses the dep. Vosges, where it disappears underground near Bazeilles, and reappears, 2 m. distant, near Neufchâteau. In France it passes Commercy, St. Mihiel, and Verdun, Sedan, Mézières, Charleville, Givet; in Belgium, Dinant, Namur, Huy, and Liège; in Holland, Maastricht, Roermond, Venlo. There it changes its course from NE. to N. Lower down it changes to NW. and then W., and after approaching within a mile of the Waal (left arm of the Rhine) near Heerewaarden, above the Bommelerwaard, it finally enters the Waal below the Bommelerwaard at Woudrichem, above Gorinchem (Gorkum). Such is the real course of the river, but the names employed are confusing. At the confluence the name of the Waal becomes changed to Merwede, and the Merwede is considered the lower course of the M. instead of that of the Waal, which is a stream of greater volume, and is continued in direction by the Merwede. About five or six miles below the confluence the Merwede divides into two arms, one of which enters the Hollandsch Diep (which again divides into the Haringvliet and Krammer), while the other proceeds W. to Dordrecht. Here the stream again divides, and at the point of division the name of Maas is again employed by the Dutch. The part of the stream that continues to flow west, S. of the IJsselmonde, is known as the Oude Maas (Old M.); the remainder proceeds N. by the Noordsche Kil (N. Channel) to the Lek (right arm of the Rhine), which below the confluence is known as the Nieuwe Maas (New M.). This after passing Rotterdam reunites with the Oude Maas, although now an artificial channel known as the New Waterway parallel to and N. of the so-called Maas forms the channel to Rotterdam even for large ships. In times of high water a secondary channel is provided for the surplus waters of the Maas (which would otherwise overflow its embankments) by an overflow outlet to the S. of Nijmegen, which rejoins the river at a point to the S. of the Bommelerwaard, a wide tract of country being thus overflowed in N. Brabant every spring. Moreover, when the Waal stands very high the current ascends the Maas at the point of junction, and part of its water is also allowed to escape into the Maas by an outlet above the Bommelerwaard, and a new outlet then comes into operation by which the water thus ponded back is allowed to enter the Hollandsch Diep by an old channel of the Maas known as the Oude Maasje (Old Little M.), which leaves the Maas to the E. of Heusden. To remedy the dangers and inconveniences thus caused, a plan was adopted in 1883 by the Dutch legislature for shutting off the Maas completely from the Waal, abolishing the present river-bed between Heusden and Woudrichem, and causing the entire volume of the river to enter the Hollandsch Diep by a bed nearly identical with that of the Oude Maasje. At Pagny the M. is joined by the Marne and Rhine Canal, from which a little lower down the Canal de l'Est branches off; and at Bar by the Canal des Ardennes, which connects it with the riv. Aisne. Length, in France 305 m., in Belgium 120 m., in the Netherlands 150 m.; total, 575 m. Navigable from Troussey, near Void, above Verdun, 135 m. from its source. Area of basin, 12,740 sq. m.

M. is principally formed (1) by a mass of highlands (with the M. plateau, 6000–10,000 ft. mean alt.) between the four depressions of (a) the Gulf of M. (E.), (b) the Pacific (W. and S.), (c) riv. Colorado-Gila and Rio Grande del Norte (0–3500 ft., N.), (d) the Tehuantepec isthmus (0–389 ft., SE.); (2) by the mountainous lands in Central America E. of the Tehuantepec (as far as Guatemala), and their extension in the Yucatan Penin.; (3) by the penin. of Vieja (old), or Baja (lower) California. Orography and Hydrography.—The plateau is bordered (W.) along the Pacific by many parallel ridges, between two Sierras Madres (with crests above 9000 ft.), which diverge from N. to S., and finally meet the E. border chains (E. Sierra Madre from Nuevo Leon to Vera Cruz) which run along the Gulf of M. (with crests of 6000 ft. alt.) in several angular terraces above the lowlands of the Tehuantepec isthmus. The S. and highest angle (Junta) is marked by the peaks of Perote (or Nauhcampatepetl, 'four-cornered mountain,' above 13,000 ft.), Orizaba (or Citlaltepetl, 'star mountain,' above 18,000 ft.), Popocatepetl ('smoking mountain,' above 17,000 ft.), Toluca (above 15,000 ft.), Apisco (above 12,000 ft.). The plateau is in a general way inclined from S. to N. and from W. to E. The highest lands lying in the S. are divided into two masses (from 7000 ft. to above 16,000 ft.) by a relative depression (at 6000 ft. to 7000 ft.) in the direction of the Rio Grande de Santiago-Lerma valley and Lake Chapala (the largest in M., 56 m. long). In the middle of the southernmost mass (the Anahuac plateau) there is a self-contained lacustrine region near the city of M. (the M. valley, with the shallow lakes San Mateo, Zumpanga, Zaltocan, San Cristobal, Terecoco, Xochimilco, Xalco). N. of the highest region, between the E. Sierra Madre and the Rio Grande del Norte, in the centre of extensive plains, the plateau becomes hollow, and forms two almost continuous lacustrine self-contained regions: (1) el Bolson de Mapimi with Lakes de Parras, del Muerto, Tlahualila, de Agua Verde, de Santa Maria, Palomas, Jaco; and (2) Lakes de Patos, Santa Maria, Guzman. Along the penin. of California runs, in rather broken fragments (Calamahue, 10,000 ft.; Tres Virgenes, 7000 ft.), a Sierra (continuation of Sierra Nevada) parallel to the Sierras Madres. The rivers may be grouped as follows:—(1) Rio Grande del Norte (which forms the NE. border of M. for 746 m.), collecting the irregular waters on that side of the whole M. plateau through its more or less permanent affluents (the Conchos, Salado-Sabinas-Toya, Saltillo-Pesquerto); (2) a number of rivers which lose themselves in interior lakes (the Bolsones region), or in the plains, some of the N. part of the Pacific slopes (Sonora); (3) the rivers of the Pacific slope further S.—principal, the Yaqui-Mutatos, Mayo, del Fuerte, Sinaloa, Culiacan, Camichin; (4) those draining the highlands in the S.—the NE. section by the Tampico, the W. and S. by the Rio Tololotnan or Grande de Santiago-Lerma and Atoyac-Mexcala-de las Balsas; (5) on the Tehuantepec isthmus the waters are collected, N., by the San Juan, Coatzacoalcos, and the Tonala, Tabasco-Grijalva, Usumacinta system, the latter draining the highlands of Chiapas and Yucatan. Along the littoral of both seas, but principally along the Gulf of M., the waters collect in several large lakes (Madre, Marina, Morales, Tampico, Tamiahua, N.; Terminos, S.). Geology.—Mexican rocks are pre-eminently eruptive and volcanic (trachytic porphyries), on which, along the slopes to the two seas, lie large masses of calcareous formations, followed, lower down, right above the recent littoral sediments, by large deposits of sandstones (Tertiary ?). Granite and gneiss are conspicuous in some points. In the California penins. they are covered with Tertiary deposits. An extensive volcanic zone lies principally between parallels 18–20°, with some active volcanoes (Orizaba, Popocatepetl, Taxtla, Jorullo, Colima) and numerous extinct ones. Earthquakes are frequent, although never very violent. A great extent of calcareous lands near the gulf (Yucatan) are of coralline origin. Minerals.—M. is the richest metalliferous country in the world. Four-fifths of the whole area are mining regions, the working of which has been carried on most actively in (a) the W. Sierra Madre region, (b) the E. Sierra Madre (San Luis Potosi, Hidalgo), which yield, in gold and silver, more than one-fifth of the total production of the world. There are numerous still unworked mines and endless old scoriæ with 25–30 per cent. of metal (from 1880–92, $48,720,600 of silver; all metals, $401,100,000). The argentiferous region would be intersected by a line drawn from the city of M. to Guanajuato, then N. to the SW. of Chihuahua, then S. to Oajaca. The principal mineral districts (silver and gold) are: Guanajuato, Zacatecas, Fresnillo, Real del Monte, Pachuca, Catorce, Tasco, and Oajaca; lead (Lomo de Toro, in Hidalgo), copper (Inguaran, Oropeo, Churumuco, in Michoacan), platinum (Hidalgo), iron (principally at Durango, Michoacan), mercury (at Guadalcazar, in San Luis Potosi; Huitzuco, in Guerrero, &c.), tin (at Guanajuato, Jalisco, Durango, Sonora, San Luis Potosi, Aguascalientes), cobalt, antimony, bismuth (Chihuahua, Jalisco), manganese, sulphur (San Antonio, Guascaman, in San Luis Potosi, Mapinsi, in Durango, all the volcanic regions), zinc (Tasco, Guerrero), coal (on the riv. Mayo, in Sonora, on the Rio Branco del Norte, Tamaulipas, and at Huetamo, among the mountains of the S., in Puebla, Vera Cruz), petroleum (at Macuspana, in Tabasco; Tuxpan, in Vera Cruz), soda, salt (Peñon Blanco, in San Luis Potosi; Tapado, Zamorelia, Yucatan), marble, onyx, and precious stones are all met with, and mineral waters are abundant.

Climate.—The general mean temp. is about 60°. NE. trade winds, bringing the greatest rains to the E. slopes, blow all over M., and are even felt on the W. ct. (Papagaios, see Nicaragua); they are sometimes deviated, so as to blow from the N. (Nortes, Oct.–March), and become dry and stormy, through being united to the cold current of the Mississippi valley. SW. winds are the S. trade-winds attracted N. SE. and S. equatorial winds are sometimes cyclonic (Cordonazos de San Francisco). Rains are abundant, S. of the tropic, on the maritime slopes (79 to 118 in. per year; thunderstorms in May). The plateau is dry everywhere (zenithal rains, June–Sept.); the regions in the N. (Sonora, Chihuahua, Coahuila, Nuevo Leon) very dry. The low lands (Tierras Calientes) have a mean temp. above 73°, with some exceedingly hot places (Tuxpan, mean temp. 76°, rfall. 62 in.; Mazatlan, 6 years, mean temps. 75.5°, max. 94°, min. 49°, rfall. 38 in.; Colima, 15 years, mean temp. 78°, rfall. 4 in.), and are very damp. The temperate zone (Tierras templadas), on the slopes (between 2000 ft. and 8000 ft.), is healthy, and enjoys the temp. and productions of S. Europe. N. winds sometimes bring heavy fogs. The so-called cold regions (Tierras frias) on the plateau have cold nights and winters, but hot days and summers, the extreme of temp. and the dryness (principally March–May) increasing from S. to N. [Guadalajara, San Luis Potosi]. The rains (June–Sept.) last but a short time per day. Snow falls in M. at about 7400 ft., and persists above 10,500–16,000 ft. in the frozen regions (Tierras heladas). The flora of M. is very peculiar, and very rich. Zones of altitude may be distinguished: (1) Littoral, sandy, and marshy, yielding grass, with groups of trees (Celtis, Platanus, Quercus: encinales); coco-nut palms (Iriartea), Opuntia, Baccharis. (2) Tropical forests, with their complete development in Tabasco and Chiapas—Anonaceæ, Ficus, Cecropis, Castilloa; timber (mahogany, &c.); dye-woods (logwood), epiphytes (Phyllocactus), Orchideæ (vanilla). Cacao and tropical fruits are cultivated here. (3) Savannas with very high grasses (bamboos, Rottbœlliaceæ, giant Paniceæ, and Copperaceæ), and groups of trees (arboreal ferns, cycads, Quercus oleoides, Mimosæ). The sugar-cane, cotton, and rice are cultivated. (4) From 3000 to 6000 ft. the Melastomaceæ are characteristic. Ferns and Apocyneæ (Phimeria) show a great variety; Elaphrium (copal). Oaks lose their leaves on the upper zones, and keep perennial foliage on the lower ones, covered with epiphytes. European fruits and vegetables are cultivated. (5) From 5000 to 7000 ft. arboreal Liliaceæ and Amaryllidaceæ, including the Agave (maguey, ixtle), Yucca, Fourcroya, and Dasylirion, are characteristic, in addition to Cactaceæ, Crassulaceæ, and Compositæ, as well as the algarrobia or mezquite. The Agave (growing from the sea up to 10,000 ft.) and maize are cultivated. (6) About 16,000 ft. vegetation ends. The highest forests are of oaks, Coniferæ, with epiphytic Bromeliaceæ, Laurineæ, climbing bamboos. The herbaceous vegetation presents a N. American or European character. Europe received from M. the first plants of cacao, earth-nuts (Arachys hypogæa), pine apple, tomato, agave, jalap, sarsaparilla, and the Cactaceæ. The fauna of the highlands resembles the N. American, that of the tropical littoral the W. Indian. In a general way the land animals seem to have come from the N., the marine ones from the S. Man (Peñon), the mastodon, rhinoceros, elephant, Cervus, horse, and Glyptodon, are found as fossils. The Tierras Calientes are the richest zoological regions, with monkeys (three species), vampires, pumas, cougars, tapirs, geckos, crocodiles, terrapins, humming-birds (raios de sol), zopilotes (Cathartes, 'the king' zopilote, Sarcorhamphus papa). On the slopes (Tierra templada) the boa imperator, which was adored by the Aztecs, is plentiful. Insects are numerous (the luminous elaterides, the arrieros, Œcodoma mexicana, ants which pierce the hardest rocks). In the N. the bear, wild sheep, wolves (coyotes), puma, jaguar, opossum, antelopes, peccaries, numerous lizards, and scorpions are met with. The lakes of the valley of M. have no fishes but the axolotl (Siredon lichenoides). The coasts of the Gulf of M. and the Pacific coasts have two very different faunæ. Molluscs are very varied (pearl-bearing oysters in the Californian Gulf). Ethnography.—The principal races came to M., in more than one current, from the N. Architectural, sculptural, and literary monuments of many civilisations (still visible) were found by the Spaniards in the 16th century, and especially ascribed to two great empires—the Aztecs, on the Anahuac plateau, and the Mayas, on the Yucatan penins. One great current of Nahua ('people who speak clear') seems to have conquered central and S. Mexico (6th century) from the tribes previously settled there (Otomi, Huaxteques, &c.). They are said to have received their arts and civilisation from one Quatzalcoatl, who came from the E. sea. The Nahua ultimately broke up into different sections, one of which, the Nahua-Chichimecs, drove the Nahua-Toltecs to the S. (Yucatan, Chiapas, and Guatemala), and established themselves on the banks of the lakes of the S. plateau (Xaltocan and Texcoco), and carried on war with the Nahua-Aztecs, fortified on the Tenochtitlan-

Mexico I. The latter, united to the tribes of Texcoco and Tlacopan, formed the national nucleus which Cortez and the Spaniards believed to be a great united empire under Montezuma. The Indians now inhabiting M. belong to many groups. . (1) Those in the N. evidently come from the Arizona and New Mexico tribes (Californian penins.: Cotchimi, Guayaura, from the N. along the W. slopes, Papagos, Pima, Opata, Cahita, Seri) along the Rio Grande del Norte and Chihuahua, E. plains (the Apaches). (2) In the high valleys of the W. Sierra Madre are the troglodytic Parahumara, further S. the Tepehuan ('lords of the mountains'), both with great linguistic and physical affinities to Asiatic nations. (3) From the W. plains of Chihuahua to the heart of the W. Sierre Madre, are the Conchos, Sabaibs, Acaxec, Xixime—tribes akin to the Nahua. (4) On the mountains of the Anahuac plains (between San Luis Potosi, Queretaro, and M.) the Otomi (with a monosyllabic language). (5) In the Mexican Valley, and further S., W., and E., the direct descendants of the Aztecs, and their nearer allies and rivals—the Tarhascue-Michoacan in the W., and the Huaztecs ('neighbours') in the E., the latter being rather a Maya colony, as are, further S., the Totonacs or 'three hearts.' (6) From the S. mountains to the Tehuantepec isthmus dwell the Mixtecs, the Lapotecs (Oajaca), and (7) from the isthmus to Chiapas, the Mixé, the Loqué, the Chinantecs, and (8) the Aztec-Coconosco. (9) On the Yucatan Penin. are the Maya (Ma-ya-he, 'land without water'), preserving their customs and language among the splendid ruins of their former civilisation. They consider themselves the result of two different ethnological currents—one, Nahua from the W. along the lands, the other from NE. across the sea. (10) Many tribes, more or less of Maya descent, occupy the lands to the S. (Chiapanecs, Tzendal, Lacandons, Chontales, 'wild,' Chol, Mamé). In all there are some 700 tribes speaking 120 dialects, incompletely and provisionally classified into eleven families. The population after the Spanish conquest became exceedingly mixed. The pure Spanish blood is very rare (Chapetones, Gachupines, 'those who wear spurs'). The densest population is to be found on the Anahuac plateau (between San Luis Potosi, Guadalajara, Morelos, Puebla). The arid plains of the N. (Chihuahua) and the marshy lowlands of the S. (Tabasco) are desert. There are some prosperous recent agricultural European settlements: French (San Rafael, or the Nautla, since 1831); Italian (Vera Cruz, Puebla, Morelos); Tirolese (San Luis Potosi); Canarians (Campeche). Some industrial immigration from the United States, and Spaniards, French, Italians. Negroes are being introduced for the unhealthy Tierras Calientes. Some Chinese colonies are contemplated. Nosology.—The great altitude causes the plateau to be in various ways rather unhealthy, producing anæmia and premature decay; pneumonia, typhoid fever, and cancer are frequent, but phthisis is very rare. The prevalent diseases on the shores of the Gulf of M. are marsh fevers, yellow fever (only up to 2500 ft. or 3000 ft. alt.), and phthisis. On the Pacific coast bilious fevers and dysenteries. On the highlands they often have their skins covered with white, red, and black spots (mal de pintos). On the slopes to Vera Cruz the Mayoquil frequently gets into the skin and causes abscesses. Productions. — Maize, beans (frigotes), and bananas form the principal food-products of the temperate zone; manihot and rice those of the low Tierras Calientes. Wheat and barley are cultivated on the high Tierras frias. Besides these the principal productions are: coffee (Tierras templadas of Vera Cruz, Oajaca, Michoacan-Uruapan, up to 5500 ft.); tobacco (Vera Cruz: from Papaloapam to Tabasco); sugar-cane (introduced by Cortez: in the S.—Morelos, Puebla, Campeche, Yucatan, and up to 6000 ft.); cacao (on the low slopes of the Soconosco Mts., Chiapas); vanilla (Papantla, San Rafael); cotton (Guerrero, Vera Cruz); the fibres of the Agave, principally the henequen (A. rigida at Yucatan, and the ixtle, the lechuguilla, A. heteracantha, in the San Luis Potosi, Valles); the pita (from Bromelia sylvestris, Oajaca); the Agave wine (octli, aguamiel, pulque); and brandy (mexcal, tequila, Mexican brandy); and that from the opuntia (Colonche). All fruits, both of temperate and tropical regions, can be grown. The vine is extensively cultivated (Chihuahua and N. of Zacatecas). The government is patronising the introduction of vines, olive-trees, and all kinds of fruit-trees from Europe. The mulberry (introduced by Cortez) is extensively planted for the silk-worm, while the aje, or axin (the oil cochineal, Llaveia axin) is extensively produced (Yucatan). Cinchonæ (E. slopes of the Orizaba Mts.) and rubber trees (Castilloa elastica, in Chiapas and Tabasco) are planted. Cattle, horses (N. plains and savannas of Vera Cruz, Tabasco), and swine (M. and Jalisco) are largely reared (exportation to the United States). Yellow amber is abundantly found (Oaxaca and all S. states). Guano is plentiful on the islands of the Gulf of California. There is a noticeable industrial progress (textiles, paper, earthenware), the national costume (mantas, sarapes, rebozos), ornamental leather, giving employment to many manufactures. Means of Communication.—(1) Two railways give access to the plateau from the M. Gulf; (a) Vera Cruz—M. Rly., the first built, was one of the most difficult of construction in the world (from the sea up to 8309 ft.); (b) a second line goes from Tampico to San Luis Potosi and M. (2) At four points the M. railways reaches the United States: (a) Paso del Norte, New M.; (b) Laredo; (c) Piedras Negras (Texas, Rio Grande del Norte); (d) from Guaymas (Gulf of California) to Arizona. (3) An inter-oceanic railway (Coatzocoalcas-Suchil-Tehuantepec-Salina Cruz) runs between the Gulf of M. and the Pacific (197 m.). (4) Many railway branches starting from the central system will shortly reach the ports of Altata, Mazatlan, San Blas, Manzanillo, Sihuantanego, Acapulco, Huatulco (one reaches at Cumbre de las Cruces an alt. of 9974 ft.). (5) Some railways in Yucatan, but separated from those in central M. by some 400 m. (Campeche to Alvarado). Total, 7000 m. Direct steamers ply to the W. Indies, the United States, California, Europe, and between the littoral ports. There are submarine cables from Vera Cruz to Galveston, and from Salina Cruz to Libertad (Salvador) and Central America (Pacific). Commerce.—The principal exports are—henequen, coffee, fruits, hides, leather, gum, tobacco, indigo, sugar, vanilla, caoutchouc, wood (mahogany and dyewood). Gold, silver (some coined), lead, copper. The imports are—manufactured articles for dress and furniture. For the value in recent years, see Appendix. The most important commercial relations are with the United States, then with England (1892, £1,743,300), France, Germany, Spain. The imported articles pay 38 per cent. ad valorem (English cottons, 133 per cent.). There are twenty-four ports open to international commerce. One-half of all the commerce of M. is carried on at the port of Vera Cruz. Public Institutions.—The constitution of the Estados Unidos de Mexico (1857) was amended in 1887 and 1890. A president is elected (indirectly) for four years. A Congress is composed of a House of Representatives (1 to 40,000 inhabitants) and a Senate (two Senators from each state). M. is divided into twenty-seven states, two terrs., and one federal dist. (460 sq. m. around the cap.). There is a permanent army of some 30,000 men, brought up to 160,000 in war footing, and a navy of some importance (two naval colleges at Mazatlan and Campeche). The Roman Catholic is the predominant religion, but it is quite independent of the state. The metrical system of weights and measures was officially introduced in 1884, but the old Spanish measures are still in use (see Bolivia). The silver peso or dollar (weight 27,073 grammes, .902 fine = 24.419 grammes of silver) has a nominal value of 4s. (the 16-pesos gold piece weighs 27.0643 grammes, .875 fine = 23.6813 grammes of gold). Silver is unlimited legal tender. For the gold value of the dollar in recent years, see Appendix, p. 14. History.—At the beginning of the 16th century the Spaniards discovered the coasts of Yucatan and M. In 1519 Cortez established Villa Rica de la Vera Cruz (N. of the present town), and began the conquest of the Aztecs (under Montezuma) and of some of the most prominent Indian tribes, laying the foundation of the Nueva España viceroyalty. In 1585 the first European station was established at Paso del Norte (Rio Bravo). From 1810 to 1821 M. fought for her independence from Spain. In 1822 Iturbide was proclaimed Emperor, but one year later a federal republic was declared, not recognised by Spain until 1833. From 1845 to 1848 a war with the United States led to the loss of upper California and New Mexico. In 1861, under a financial pretext, M. was invaded by a French army, which imposed the form of an empire (1863) and an emperor (1864, Maximilian of Austria), who, after the departure of the French troops, was taken and executed (1867). The Republic of the United States of Mexico was reconstituted in 1868. Population in 1808 about 6,000,000; 1879, 10,000,000; 1882, 10,500,000; 1893, 11,614,000 (of which more or less pure white, 19 per cent.; mixed, 43 per cent.; Indians, 38 per cent.). [J. B. E.]

Mexico, one of the central states, around the District Federal and the cap. of the Republic of the same name, on the centre of the Anahuac plateau, and the highest part of its slopes. Very mountainous, with some of the highest peaks in M. Very important mines of silver, gold, &c. (Ixtlahuacan, Sultepec, Temascaltepec, Valle de Bravo). See Mexico (republic), table.

Mexico, tn., cap. of the Republic of M., built by Cortez (1522) on the ruins of the Aztec Mexico-Tenochtitlan ('Nopal stone'), in the centre of the valley of M. (7500 ft. alt.), on a lacustrine region, now 4 m. from the shallow lake Texcoco, but formerly on one of its islands; seat of an observatory, in 19° 26′ 1″ N., 99° 6′ 39″ W. The streets are very regular; the houses low, and in the Spanish style. The site is marshy, and subject to unhealthy floods and earthquakes. The new quarters stretch W. to the higher and healthier lands. The roads leading to the town act as bridges through the marshy fields which surround the town The gardens have a tropical vegetation; the markets, fruits and vegetables from all climates. Some are cultivated on floating orchards on the lake (Chinampas). Has a cathedral of the 16th century, museums, library, university, medical and military colleges. Mean temp. (12 yrs.), 60° F., max. 89°, under the sun 120°, min. 28½°; mean rfall. 29 in. in 130 days. P. 330,000.

Mexico, Gulf of, an inland sea or gulf, nearly surrounded by a continuous coast line (3000 m.) of the United States and Mexico. It is only open to the E.; communicating NE., on one side of the isl. of Cuba, with the Atlantic through the Strait of Florida, and on the SE., on the other side of Cuba, with the Caribbean Sea through the Strait of Yucatan. The shores are low, sandy, and marshy, the land being frequently fronted by lagoons. It has no islands except the 'keys' of Florida and Yucatan, and Cuba. The deepest parts of the gulf, between the mouth of the Mississippi and the peninsula of Yucatan, exceed 2000 fathoms, the maximum 2119 fathoms ('Blake' Soundings), in 25° 8′ N., 89° 38′ W. This deep basin, which is elliptical in shape, has steep, abrupt walls, and is surrounded next the shores by a broad shallow rim, not exceeding 100 fathoms in depth. Area, 716,000 sq. m. Length, Vera Cruz to Florida, 1120 m.; breadth, Galveston to Campeche, 680 m. The rivs. Grande del Norte, Colorado, Brazos, Mississippi, Alabama, and Appalachicola, with numerous smaller streams, pour their waters into the gulf. The Gulf Stream (q.v.) enters it by the Strait of Yucatan, and leaves it by the Strait of Florida. The tides are low and relatively insignificant, springs not exceeding 4 ft., and neaps 2½ ft. The waters of the gulf are extremely rich in marine fauna—fish, sponges, corals, echinoderms, crustacea, annelids, &c. The principal seaports on its shores are—in Mexico, Progreso, Campeche, Carmen, Vera Cruz, and Tampico; in the United States, Galveston, New Orleans, and Key West; and in Cuba, Havana.

Mich'igan, one of the U.S.A., called the Peninsula state because of its two parts, the upper being bordered by Lakes Superior, Huron, and Michigan, the lower by Lakes Michigan, Huron, St. Clair, and Erie. Isle Royale, Sugar I., Drummond I. belong to M. The surface in the upper penin. consists of low mountain ranges and hills rich in iron ore and copper, while the lower penin. is hilly in the N., having prairie land in the S., underlaid with coal. Both penins. have extensive forests of pine and hardwoods. Thousands of small lakes exist. The chief streams, Muskegon, Grand, Kalamazoo, St. Joseph, and Saginaw, afford little navigable water, but are valuable sources of power, by means of which a great deal of timber is cut, and numerous wood-working establishments operated. Extensive salt deposits underlie the Saginaw region, and the brine is evaporated by the use of refuse lumber as fuel. The climate is milder than the latitude would suggest, by reason of the warming influences of the lakes [Alpena, Detroit, Escanaba, Grand Haven, Marquette, Port Huron]. In the N., however, it is too raw for agriculture. S. penin. produces wheat, maize, oats, potatoes, barley, wool, and even peaches and wine. Timber is the product of greatest value, and in it M. is first, with a yearly cut of from three to four thousand million ft., besides lath and shingles. Other manufactures of wood are doors, blinds, sash, and furniture. Second in value is the output of iron ore. In this M. has risen from a production of 2700 tons in 1850 to 6,127,101 in 1891; from thirteenth to first in rank. The ore is mainly red hematite, with half a million tons of brown hematite, and a quarter million of magnetite. It is remarkably free from phosphorus, and is very rich. The mines are in three ranges, the Marquette in Marquette co., the Gogebic in Ontonagon co., and the Menominee in Menominee co. The formation is Archæan, with every evidence of eruptive origin. But little pig iron is made in M. (mostly charcoal), the bulk of the ore going by lake to points on Lakes Erie and Michigan, where the coal of Ohio and Pennsylvania and Illinois is available, M. coal being of poor quality. For many years M. yielded the greater part of all U.S. copper, and now its output of over 100,000,000 lbs., surpassed only by that of Montana, is about one-third the total product. The mines are in Keweenaw, Houghton, and Ontonagon cos., in eruptive rock, and yield a remarkably pure and tenacious metal. One solid mass was detached which weighed about 500 tons. Other mineral products are gypsum, bromine, grindstones, building-stone, glass sand, &c. Flour, agricultural implements, carriages and waggons are manufactured. There is a considerable fresh-water fishery, mostly of white fish, trout, and herring. As to the lake shipping, see Sault Ste. Marie. Education is well cared for. The university of Michigan is at Ann Arbor, and has a high rank, and there are nine other colleges. Of the population, 26 per cent. are foreign born. The first settlement in M. was at Detroit, in 1670 by Frenchmen. In 1763 this area passed to England. M. was established as a territory in 1805, and as a state in 1837. Its cap. is Lansing; the other chief towns, Detroit, Grand Rapids, Saginaw, Bay City, Muskegon, Jackson, Kalamazoo, Port Huron, and Battle Creek. Area, 58,915 sq. m. P. 2,093,889. [C. H. L.]

Middlesbrough (often spelt Middlesborough, but never locally, the charter having been given under the first form), parl., mun., and co. bor., par., seapt., and market-tn., Eng., Yorkshire, N. Riding, in the diocese of York, near the mouth of the Tees, 3½ m. ENE. Stockton, with stn. on the NE. R. Important industries in iron, steel, and chemicals, blast-furnaces, shipbuilding, salt, soda. The Cleveland dist., of which M. is the centre, is unequalled for the quantity of iron produced, and ranks highly also for quality. Built in 1830 for shipping coal, M. owes its growth first to the coal export trade, and secondly to the discovery of the ironstone in the adjoining hills. Incorporated in 1853, and made a co. bor. in 1888. A park of 72 ac. was given to the town by its first mayor, an ironmaster, who was also the first M.P. for the bor. There is a large dock, and much exportation of coal. Depth at entrance to port at high water ordinary springs 34 ft., ordinary neaps 31 ft. Anchorage area with 24 ft. of water, 20 ac. The dock has a length of 1200 ft., and a depth over sill at ordinary spring tides of 27 ft. 5 in., ordinary neap tides 24 ft. For shipping statistics, see Appendix, p. 13. Market-day, S. Total	149,817[1]	564,400

[1] The administrative county includes also the part of E. Barnet Valley, urban sanitary dist. in the administrative county of Hertford, and the part of Barnet in that of Hertford, also pars. now forming part of the county of London. Area, 149,046. P. 560,012.

Surface mostly flat in the SW., elsewhere undulating, but nowhere rising above 450 ft. Principal rivers, besides the Thames, the Colne and Lea, which form respectively its W. and E. boundaries, and the Brent. The county is traversed by the main lines and branches of the principal railways, which have termini in the metropolis. The Grand Junction, Lee Navigation, and Regent's Canals, and the New River Cut, for the water supply of the metropolis, also intersect the county. For several centuries the greater part of the county was covered with forest; of this the most important survival is Enfield Chase. Grass farms, for the supply of London with milk and hay, greatly exceed in extent the arable land. Market gardens and orchards are extensive, and a large portion of the county is occupied by villas and pleasure-grounds. For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 7–9. Minerals are unimportant, with the exception of clay for brick-making. Geological formation entirely Oligocene and Eocene. For manufactures, see London, which absorbs nearly all the urban wealth of the county, there being no other towns of importance. The government small arms factory is situated at Enfield.

Midi, Canal du, large navigation canal, France, connecting the Garonne and the canal lateral to the Garonne with the Mediterranean, and traversing three deps., Haute-Garonne, Aude, and Hérault, begins at Toulouse, its highest point being at the Col de Naurouse, alt. 620 ft.; at Onglous it reaches the pool of Thau, which is navigable, communicating with the sea at Cette. The first survey of the canal in 1598 by the engineers Crapponne and Renault had no result; Peter Paul Riquet (a member of the family to which Mirabeau, the revolutionary leader, belonged) made plans, which were adopted by Louis XIV. in 1666, and completed in 1680; the canal was opened in 1681. It has been proposed to transform the Canal du M. into a canal accessible for sea-going vessels of large size. Length, 150 m.

Milan, Italian Milano, German Mailand, ancient Mediolanum, a city of N. Italy, cap. prov. M., in a wide fertile plain, on the little riv. Olona. Lat. of observatory 45° 28′ N., long. 9° 11′ E. M. is nearly of a circular shape, enclosed by ramparts, with a strong castle. The streets, with a few exceptions, are narrow and crooked. The chief object of interest is the cathedral, a Gothic edifice of white marble, founded by Count Gian Galeazzo Visconti in 1386, and practically completed in 1805; the delicacy of its carved work is unrivalled; length, 486 ft.; breadth, 187 ft.; height of dome, 356 ft. Its dimensions are only exceeded in Europe by St. Peter's at Rome, and the cathedral of Seville. It has niches for about 7000 statues, and contains the tombs of Archbishop Heribert, Otho Visconti, and Cardinal Charles Borromeo. Next in order come the churches of Sant' Eustorgio and of St. Ambrogio, the latter the most ancient mediæval structure in M., and in which the Emperors of Germany were crowned; the church of Santa Maria della Grazia, in which is the famous 'Last Supper' of Da Vinci, now nearly obliterated; the royal palace, the archbishop's palace, the city hall, and the colonnade of Victor Emmanuel, a magnificent covered promenade. Foremost among the benevolent institutions is the huge 15th century hospital for 2500 patients. The finest gate is the Arco della Pace, a sculptured marble arch, at the end of the Simplon road, begun in 1807 by order of Napoleon I., but not completed till 1838; near it is the Piazza d'Armi, a large open space for the exercise of troops. The opera house, La Scala, which is seated for 3600 spectators, is the second largest in Italy. The scientific and educational establishments embrace the royal academy of arts and sciences, formerly the palace of the Brera, with a library of 200,000 volumes, valuable MSS., and a gallery of paintings, an archæological museum, an astronomical and magnetic observatory, and the sublime monument to Gaston de Foix; the Ambrosian library, founded by Cardinal Borromeo, in 1609, with 155,000 volumes and 15,000 MSS., the earliest public library in Europe, is celebrated for its collection of palimpsests. The public gardens contain a statue to Cavour. In the neighbourhood of M. is Linterno, the solitude to which Petrarch retired after the death of Laura. M. is the largest book mart in Italy. From its position on the great routes across the Alps, and its connection by rail with the principal towns, and by canal with the principal rivers of Italy, it is favourably situated for trade. The principal industries include reeling, throwing and weaving of silk, working in iron, gold, and other metals, manufacture of machinery, velvet, cordage, braid, and trimmings, chemical industries, &c. M. is said to have been founded by the Gauls 603 B.C. At the time of the Roman conquest (222 B.C.) it was chief amongst the cities of Cisalpine Gaul. The Emperor Maximian made it his residence, surrounded it with walls, and greatly improved it. Later it became the cap. of northern Italy, and the see of a bishop (St. Ambrose the most famous). In the 5th and 6th centuries it suffered severely during the invasions of the Huns and Goths. Under the Carlovingian kings it again rose to importance, and had a population of 300,000. The Archbishop of M. (it had been erected into an archbishopric in 777) encouraged the public spirit and patriotism of the Milanese, who early acquired considerable independence. Manufactures (cloth, arms, gold-work, &c.) were established, and extensive trade was maintained with the East. Its prosperity was interrupted by a long series of wars with rival towns lasting till 1162, when Barbarossa gave it up to pillage, and then razed it. Shortly afterwards it was rebuilt, and the emperor was compelled (1174) to acknowledge its independence, and it was constituted a republic; industry flourished, the woollen and silk manufactures alone employing about 100,000 persons. In 1277 Otho Visconti established the first ducal dynasty, which lasted till 1447. From 1450 to 1535 it was ruled by the house of Sforza. In 1535 the Milanese was annexed by Charles V., and thenceforward ruled by Spanish governors till the 18th century, when it passed under the Austrian power. In 1805 Napoleon Buonaparte was crowned king of Italy at M., and in 1859 M. was united to the crown of Italy. The poet Virgil studied here, and it is the birthplace of Popes Pius IV. and Gregory XIV., of Beccaria, and of Manzoni. The neighbourhood of M., to the S. and W., is unhealthy. Alt. 480 ft. Mean temp., yr. 55.4° F., Jan. 34.7°, July 77.0°; rfall. (17 yrs.), yr. 39.37 in. (1764–1891), yr. 39.5 in., Oct.–Nov. 9.1 in. P. (1871) 199,009, besides military; (1881) 295,500.

Milwaukee, chief city and port of entry of Wisconsin, U.S., cap. M. co., on W. shore of Lake Michigan, 80 m. N. by W. Chicago, in 43° 2′ N., on a bay on which a harbour has been improved by the construction of breakwaters. The mouth of the riv. Milwaukee, which forms the inner harbour, admits the largest lake-ships to the heart of the town. Steam-ships have been despatched from M. direct to England without breaking bulk. Altogether, the harbour is the best on the W. or S. shore of the lake, which accounts for the rapid rise of the city—a mere village of 2000 inhabitants in 1840. It has a large export of grain (principally barley, wheat, and oats) and of iron ore from NW. Michigan and N. Wisconsin, and a large import trade in coal, &c. There are immense flour-mills, and manufactures of lager beer, pig iron, iron-castings, machinery, steam-engines, agricultural implements, &c. Fully half the population is of German origin. Alt. 592 ft. (City Engineer); signal station, 697 ft. (U.S. Signal Office). Mean temp., yr. 45.3° F., Jan. 20.6°, July 69.4°; rfall. (12 yrs.), 34.15 in. P. Min-kiang (or -ho), an important riv., China, prov. Süchwan, regarded by the Chinese as the true headwater of the Yangtse-kiang. According to Baber, the name is not known locally, at least in its lower course, but when called by a special name is known as the Fu R., from the three important cities having the rank of -fu (Chengtu-fu, Kiating-fu, and Sui-fu) on its banks, or connected with it by canal. It rises in eastern Tibet, and flows first SE. or E., then nearly due S. through a mountain gorge in the N. of Süchwan, about the meridian of 103° 35′ E., emerges on the plain of Chengtu-fu at Kwan-hsien, about 31° N., and at once gets broken up into a number of irrigating channels [Süchwan], becomes a single river again about 30¾° N., flows S. to Kiating-fu, in 29° 34′ N., where it receives on the W. (r. bk.) the united waters of the Ya-ho and Tung-ho, then flows SE. and enters the Yangtse-kiang at Sui-fu, where it has a width of ⅓ to ⅔ m. Navigable to the plain of Chengtu-fu, which is connected with the river by a canal.

Minneapolis (formed from Indian name Minne, 'water,' and Greek polis, 'a city'), city, U.S., Minnesota, Hennepin co., on both sides of the Mississippi, at the Falls of St. Anthony, the immense water-power afforded by which is used in flour-milling, so that M. has become the greatest centre of the wheat and flour trade in the U.S., 6 m. W. St. Paul. Since 1880 the flour trade has grown rapidly. In 1879 it was less than 1,000,000 barrels, now it is 643,000,000 barrels. Seat of the university of Minnesota. First settled in 1849. Alt. 825 ft. (R.R.). P. (1860, within its present limits) 5800; (1870) 18,100; (1880) 46,900; (1890) 164,700.

Minnedosa, tn., Canada, prov. Manitoba, on the Manitoba & NW. Rly., 79 m. W. Portage-la-Prairie. Alt. 1796 ft. Mean temp. (7 yrs., 1881–88), yr. 30.2° F., Jan. −11.0°, July 62.2°. P. <1500.

Minnesela, vil., U.S., S. Dakota, Butte co., on the N. Fork of the Cheyenne R., and 88 m. S. by E. from the NW. corner of the state. P. <1500.

Minneso'ta, riv., U.S., Minnesota, in the S. It issues from Big Stone Lake, on the W. frontier of the state, and flows SE. to Mankato, then turns abruptly NNE. and enters the Mississippi between Minneapolis and St. Paul. Navigable at low water about 40 m. up, at other times by small boats to Patterson's Rapids, 295 m. up.

Minnesota, derived from Indian Minne, 'water,' and meaning 'sky blue water,' one of the United States of America, containing the headwaters of the Mississippi and of Lake Superior, S. of Manitoba, N. of Iowa, and about in the centre of the continent. Cap. St. Paul; other chief cities, Minneapolis, Duluth, Winona, Stillwater, Mankato, St. Cloud, Faribault, Red Wing, Rochester. The surface varies in elevation from 1680 ft., on the Height of Land in the NE., to 660 ft. at the S. boundary, and its prevailing character is an undulating plain. The Red River valley, in the NW., is quite flat. There are several thousand small lakes, among them Lake Itasca, belonging to three types: (1) those filling rocky basins, (2) expansions of slowly flowing rivers, (3) those filling the hollows of glacial drift deposit. Many of them are becoming dry, and rapidly disappearing. Besides numerous other streams, the state has four navigable rivers —Mississippi, Minnesota, Red, and St. Croix. The climate is marked by cold, dry winters, and warm and relatively moist summers, with the extremes reduced near Lake Superior [Breckenridge, Duluth, St. Paul]. One-sixth of the mortality is due to diphtheria. In the NE. are extensive swamp lands; a forest of white pine reaches from the head of Lake Superior W. to Red R., and yields much timber, while an abundance of oak, maple, and ash is obtained from the 'Big Woods' to the S. The S. and SE. is rolling prairie, a rich farming region. The staple crop is wheat, of fine quality, especially that grown in the Red R. valley. The falls of the Mississippi at Minneapolis are utilised in flouring mills, which produce one-twelfth the total American product. Other manufactures are agricultural implements, sashes, doors, and blinds, barrels, boots and shoes, liquors, &c. The mineral wealth of M. is chiefly in red hematite iron ore of high grade, and suitable for steel making. The state produces about a million tons yearly, standing third in the Union in this respect. The mines are near Vermillion Lake, in the Vermillion and Mesaba ranges, in St. Louis co., about 75 m. N. Duluth. The ore, which absorbs but little moisture, is nearly all shipped by lake to furnaces in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois, only a small amount being used in the state. Other mineral products are a variety of building stones and cement. Trout, white fish, and herring are taken in Lake Superior. The population of M. contains 36 per cent. of foreign born, mainly Scandinavians, Lapps, Finns, Icelanders, and Russians. About 9000 Chippewa Indians are in the N. Education is abundantly provided for, one-eighteenth of the public lands of the state being set apart to create a school fund, but attendance in the common schools is far behind the enrolment. The university of M. is at Minneapolis, and there are seven other colleges. M. was first visited by French fur traders in 1659. The part E. of the Mississippi was ceded to the English in 1763, and to U.S.A. in 1783. The western part was ceded by France in 1803. First settlement, 1819, at Fort Snelling; M. admitted as terr. in 1849, as state 1857. Many villages in the E. of state, W. and SW. of Lake Superior, especially in Kanabec and Carlton cos., were destroyed in a great forest fire in September 1894. Area, 83,365 sq. m. P. 1,301,826. [C. Surface diversified; a central sierra runs SW. and NE., giving off numerous spurs, between which are wide valleys and considerable plains, watered by tribs. of the Paraná and Uruguay. The country affords abundant pasturage, is well wooded, and exceedingly fertile; productions similar to those of the neighbouring regions. Minerals appear to be abundant in the hills, and copper-mines are known to have been worked by the Jesuits. M. formed part of Corrientes till 1888. Mississippi ('Meche Sabe,' or 'Miche Sepe,' i.e., 'The Great Water'), the most important river of N. America, and, with the Missouri, its principal affluent, the longest in the world; rises in the state of Minnesota, in a region covered with swamps and lakes, on the dividing ridge between the Red River of the North and the streams that flow southward, in 47° 14′ N., 95° 12′ W., 1558 ft. above the level of the sea, and 2553 m. from Gulf of Mexico. Of the many streams which unite to form Lake Itasca, commonly regarded as the source of the M., the principal is Nicollet's Infant Mississippi. From Lake Itasca, 1457 ft. above the sea, it flows a few miles N. and NE., then, assuming a southern course, it winds tortuously through the terr. of the U.S. to the Gulf of Mexico, which it enters at 29° N. Having thus rolled its vast volume through more than 18° of lat., and separated the states of Wisconsin, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Mississippi, on its l. or E. bank, from the states of Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana on the W., it is discharged into the gulf through a great delta formed of several arms, traversed by channels as 'passes,' of which the longest stretches for upwards of 60 m. into the sea. The M. receives many important tribs., the chief of which are, on the E., Wisconsin, Illinois, Ohio (1152 m. from its mouth), and Yazoo; from the W., Minnesota, Des Moines, Missouri (1286 from the mouth), Francis, White, Arkansas, and the Red Rivs. The river is naturally viewed under two heads, the upper M. above the influx of the Missouri, and the main M. below that junction. The former is not so large as the Missouri, but having been first explored, it received and retains the name of the M. Its waters are remarkably clear, but after commingling with those of the Missouri they become exceedingly turbid [Missouri]. The chief cities on the banks of the upper river are: St. Paul, La Crosse, Prairie du Chien, Dubuque, Muscatine, Burlington, Quincy, and Hannibal; and on the main river, St. Louis, Cairo, Memphis, Vicksburg, Natchez, Baton-Rouge, and New Orleans. The descent of the M. from its source to its mouth averages over 7½ in. per mile, that of the main stream being less than 3 in. per mile. In the upper part of its course it forms several cataracts, the principal of which are the Peckagama, 209 m. from the source, 176 m. above falls of St. Anthony, where it descends 20 ft. in 300 yds.; the Little Falls, 10 ft.; the Big Falls, 16 ft., consisting of a series of breaks and shoots extending over 800 yds.; the Prairie Rapids, six in number, which have a descent of about 20 ft. in 5 m.; and lastly, the Falls of St. Anthony, 392 m. from the source, descend 80 ft. in less than three-fourths of a mile, consisting of one leap of 16 ft., and rapids above and below. The elevations of the various points on the river are: Lake Itasca, 1457 ft.; Falls of St. Anthony, 721 ft.; Prairie du Chien, 597 ft.; mouth of the Missouri, 416 ft. at high water; mouth of Ohio, 322 ft.; Memphis, 218 ft.; Natchez, 63 ft.; Baton-Rouge, 35 ft.; and New Orleans, 15 ft. The width varies from 50 ft. at Lake Itasca, 1200 ft. at St. Paul, to 5000 ft. at mouth of Missouri, decreasing gradually to 2470 ft. below New Orleans; its average depth below the Ohio ranges from 90 to 120 ft. The mean discharge of water is 675,000 cubic ft. per second, by which 3,627,200,000 tons of sedimentary matter are yearly transported to the gulf in a state of suspension, constituting 1 sq. m. of deposit 241 ft. in depth. Besides this amount, it pushes into the sea large quantities of earthy matter, probably amounting to 750,000,000 cubic ft. annually. The vast region of the M. basin is of almost unexampled fertility. The M. is extremely winding in its course, sometimes a bend of 30 m. will occur where the distance across the neck does not exceed a mile. The character of the trade on the upper and lower M. is different. Above St. Louis it is mainly distributive, below that point the through grain trade is now the most important. Although since the opening of railways, especially from about 1860, much of the traffic has been diverted from the M., the river is still of great importance as a commercial route. During the navigation season of eight months in the upper section the river carries more freight than any of the three great trunk railways for the whole year. Below St. Louis, navigation is interrupted by ice for, on an average, about 33 days in the year. Owing to improvement in navigability of the lower river an important foreign trade has been developed, grain being shipped at St. Louis by sea-going vessels. This improvement is due to the construction at the mouth of the river of Eads's jetties—named after the engineer by whom they were designed. The jetties extend on the E. and W. sides of South Pass for 2½ and 1½ m. respectively. The foundations consist of willow mattresses weighted with stone, on which are built walls of concrete. The work was commenced in 1875, and completed in 1879 at a cost of over £1,000,000. The continuous deepening of the channel between the jetties is shown by the following figures:—in 1875, minimum depth, 10.2 ft.; 1876, 21 ft.; 1879, 27 ft.; 1883, 30.2 ft. Beyond the jetties the channel has a central depth of 30 ft.; width, 60 ft.; and depth of 26 ft. in a width of 210 ft. The M. was discovered, according to Mr. Justin Winsor, by Peneida in 1519, about a century before its discovery by Joliet, who in the opinion of the same writer, following Parkman, saw the river below La Salle. The alluvial lands of the M. cover an area of over 41,000 sq. m., the delta proper occupying about 15,000 sq. m.; the depth of the alluvium is estimated at 1000 ft. It is a remarkable feature of the M. that, flowing from N. to S., it has such a variety of climate, and consequently of productions, in the different parts of its basin, from the furs and cereal grains of the N. to the almost tropical growths of the S. As spring advances from the S. it releases in succession the snows of the lower and of the upper valley, and finally the remote sources. The annual swell of the waters is in consequence gradual and long-continued, commencing usually about the end of February, and continuing till June 1, when the waters again subside. In some seasons the waters do not rise above the embankments, and in others the entire lower valley is submerged, and often great destruction of property occasioned. The area subject to inundation, unless protected by embankments called 'levées,' is estimated at nearly 30,000 sq. m. It includes portions of seven states. During the 19th century notable floods occurred in the following years:—1828, when the St. Francis, Yazoo, and Tensas valleys were inundated; 1844, felt most severely in the trib. valleys above Red R.; 1850, the Bonnet Carre crevasse, 7000 ft. wide, was formed; 1858, Cairo was inundated, and miles of levée washed away; 1862, one of the greatest floods known; 1867, the Atchafalaya basin and Teche country deeply flooded; 1870, the Red R. rose 23 ft. at Alexandria, and the overflow by the Bonnet Carre crevasse suddenly raised Lake Pontchartrain 2 ft.; 1882, one of the most widespread and destructive floods, lasted altogether about five months, the area inundated being estimated at 22,000 sq. m., and the number of sufferers at 43,000; 1890, the M. valley S. of the Arkansas R. was extensively inundated owing to numerous breaks (crevasses) in the levées. The length of levées previous to 1882 was, r. bk. 469 m., l. bk. 522 m. Since then the levée systems in Louisiana and M. have been practically completed. The greatest difficulty encountered is caused by the frequent changes in the course of the river, and consequent caving in of the banks. The cost of the levées in Louisiana alone from 1866 to 1887 amounted to over £6,000,000. A scheme for preventing the M. flood by the storage of the surplus waters in the Missouri basin has been proposed by Major Powell of the U.S. Geological Survey. The lower M. is unable to keep its channel open owing to the excess of sediment carried (about $\frac{1}{1700}$ of its volume), and this is mainly supplied by the Missouri. The diversion of these surplus waters would allow the M. to clear its channel, while at the same time the diverted waters could be applied to the fertilisation of arid tracts. The M. is crossed above St. Louis by some eighteen railway drawbridges, and a high bridge at Dubuque. The St. Louis bridge was long the lowest on the river, but there is now one across the stream at Memphis, and in 1892 an Act of Congress was passed authorising the construction of a bridge within 5 m. above New Orleans. This bridge will have a central span of about 1100 ft., with two side spans of 800 ft. each, and a height above high water of at least 85 ft. The length of the M. is not constant. In the alluvial tract below St. Louis it is always in places increasing its length by enlarging the sweep of its curves, in others reducing its length by breaking the neck separating the ends of curves. Within the memory of single individuals it has thus been known to vary in length by as much as 150 m. According to recent data the length of the M. proper is 2616

m. (length from source of Missouri, 4194 m., or nearly 800 m. longer than the Amazon, reckoned from the source of the Apurimac); total drainage area, 1,238,642 sq. m., or 41 per cent. of the U.S. area, and equal to more than one-third of Europe.

Mississippi, co., U.S., Arkansas, bounded on N. by 36° N., and on E. by the Mississippi R.

Mississippi, co., U.S., Missouri, on the Mississippi R., crossed in the N. by 37° N.

Mississippi, one of the Gulf States of the South Central Group of the United States of America, S. of Tennessee, and bordered on the W. by the Mississippi R., which separates it from Arkansas and partly from Louisiana. M. has 90 m. coast on the Mississippi Sound. Cap. Jackson; Vicksburg, Natchez (river-ports accessible to sea-going vessels), Brookhaven, Meridian, Greenville, and Columbus are other chief towns. M. lies entirely within the broad lowland of the Gulf basin. Maximum elevation, 800 ft. in NE. Surface slopes gently to S. and W., with steep descents to the bottom lands of Mississippi R., a low area 90 m. wide at places; but at Vicksburg and Natchez the bluffs, 200–500 ft. high, overlook the water; 350 m. of levées protect from floods. The Yazoo Bottom contains 7000 sq. m. of this rich land, and produces cotton, corn, and rice; if thoroughly protected and drained, it would support a million inhabitants. Besides the Mississippi are the Yazoo and the Pearl; the Tennessee touches the NE. corner. Climate nearly sub-tropical, frosts occurring in severe winters even in the S. [Vicksburg]. Fevers prevail in bottom lands. The soil is exceedingly fruitful, except a sandy section in SE. Sixty per cent. of the state is forest land, pine in S., and oak, hickory, &c., in hill country, cypress in swamps. M. leads all other states in size of cotton crop, which is produced in the uplands mainly by labour of white men, but in the lowlands by negroes. The second staple is corn, then oats, rice, and wheat. Figs and oranges grow abundantly. Attention is being diverted somewhat from cotton to grazing, and much pork and wool are produced. The number of separate holdings has nearly tripled since 1860, a result of the break-up of the plantation system. The state has little mineral wealth, and manufactures play a minor part, lumber and cotton-seed oil being the chief. Only 42 per cent. of the population are white persons, negroes being in excess. Education is backward, a large part of the illiteracy being incurable through age, and the average attendance of children being but 55 days per year. The university of M. is at University, and there are three other colleges. De Soto crossed M. in 1540; in 1716 the French made settlements. The land was ceded to England in 1763. M. became a terr. of the U.S. in 1798, then including Alabama, which made a terr. in 1817 when M. became a state. Area, 46,810 sq. m. P. 1,289,600.

Missouri (misu'ri) one of the United States of America, N. Central Group, on the W. of the Mississippi R., which separates it from Illinois, Kentucky, and Tennessee. The Missouri R. crosses the state and also forms part of the W. boundary, adjoining Nebraska and Kansas. To the N. of the Missouri R. the surface is rolling, with deeply cut valleys, prairie land to the W., but with forests in the E. The area S. of the Missouri is crossed from NE. to SW. by the low, well-wooded Ozark Mts. (Cassville, in Barry co., 3000 ft.), W. of which is prairie land, and E. fertile lowlands and swamps, protected by levées from the floods of the Mississippi from Cape Girardeau southward (elevation 300 ft.). The latter section was much affected by a prolonged series of seismic disturbances in 1811–12. The Mississippi and Missouri each affords about 400 m. navigation, and the Osage, Gasconade, White, St. Francis, and Big Black shorter stretches. Other streams are the Chariton and Grand. The climate is one of extremes, with a tendency to affect the respiratory organs [St. Louis, and cf. Omaha, Nebraska, and Leavenworth (Kansas)]. The rainfall decreases rapidly towards the W. In the S. it is warm enough to allow the growth of cotton. The great staple is maize, of which nearly 200,000,000 bushels are produced annually. Oats, wheat, potatoes, tobacco, wool, wine, fruit, hemp, and sorghum are also grown. Much of the maize is given to swine, and these, with cattle and sheep, form the basis for the packing industry in various cities. M. and Texas lead in the number of mules bred. M. has important deposits of iron ore (red and brown hematite, and magnetite of high grade). In Iron Mt., about 70 m. SW. St. Louis, the ores contain from 61 per cent. to 68 per cent. of iron, with only from .004 per cent. to .148 per cent. of phosphorus. Pilot Knob and Shepherd Mt. have also very rich ores. The amount of ore mined, principally hematites, and the production of pig iron, have decreased in recent years, the easier shipment of Lake Superior ores to Pennsylvania, the inferior quality of Missouri coal, and the development of the southern iron industry furnishing the explanation. The coalfields of the state have an area of about 27,000 sq. m., and yield from two to three million tons of bituminous coal, chiefly in Bates, Lafayette, Roy, Randolph, and Macon cos. In SW. Missouri and SE. Kansas is the most important zinc region in the United States, yielding in 1892 156,000 tons of zinc ore, and 24,000 tons of lead ore. In M. 16,000 tons of spelter were made, and also three-fourths the non-argentiferous lead of the country. Copper-mines have closed since the great developments near Lake Superior. Other mineral products are nickel, grindstones, and glass sand. The principal manufactures are flour, packed meat, tobacco, timber, liquors, iron, steel, sugar, saddlery, boots and shoes, paints, &c. The cap. is Jefferson City; other chief towns, St. Louis, Kansas City, St. Joseph, Springfield, Sedalia, Hannibal, Joplin. The population is largely native white, the small number of foreign-born and of negroes showing a decrease since 1880. The public school system is steadily improving. Higher education is offered at the university of M., at Columbia, and by nineteen other colleges. Frenchmen settled at St. Geneviève in 1755. In 1803 the region was ceded to the United States of America as Louisiana. The terr. M. was created in 1812, the state in 1821 (Missouri Compromise). Area, 69,415 sq. m. P. 2,679,184.

Missouri (i.e., 'mud river'), the longest trib. of the Mississippi R., N. America, rises among the Rocky Mts. in Wyoming and Montana, 44½°–45° N. and 110½°–111° W., very close to the headwaters of the Snake, a trib. of the Columbia R., which flows W. to the Pacific. Its course is first N. and E. for 460 m., when it enters the Dakotas, which it traverses first E. and then S. and SE.; next it separates the states of Nebraska and Kansas on the W. from Iowa and Missouri on the E.; the last named it traverses SE. by E., and joins the Mississippi near St. Louis, at an elevation of 416 ft. above the sea, and 1286 m. from the Gulf of Mexico. It receives no very important affluent on its l. bk.; the principal are Marias, Milk, James, or Dakota, and Big Sioux Rivs. On the r. bk. are the Madison and Gallatin Forks from the Yellowstone National Park (Wyoming), which at Gallatin, in Montana, unite with the Jefferson Fork, these three being the headwaters of the M.; the remaining r. bk. tribs. are the Yellowstone, Little Missouri, and Cheyenne, White, Niobrara, Nebraska, or Platte R., Kansas, from the state of the same name, and Osage, in Missouri. Above the Marias R., and 411 m. from the source of the Missouri, the river is compressed to a width of 150 yards for a distance of nearly 6 m. by precipices which rise from the water's edge to a height of 1200 ft. This wild gorge is called the 'Gate of the Rocky Mountains.' About 110 m. below this occur the Great Falls, where the river is precipitated over four ledges, one of which is 87 ft. in height, and the others respectively 19, 47, and 26 ft., with rapids 3 to 18 ft. in descent. These falls are considered among the grandest in N. America. On the banks of the M. stand Jefferson City, Kansas City, Omaha, Sioux City, Yankton, Pierre, and Bismarck. The breadth varies from 1500 ft. below the Great Falls to 2500 ft. at Sioux City, and 3000 ft. at the mouth. Its course throughout is rapid and its waters turbid, but no serious obstacle is presented to navigation up to the Great Falls, a distance of 2575 m. from the mouth of the Mississippi. The heights of various point son the river are: the junction of the Three Forks, 4319 ft.; Great Falls, 3295 ft.; Sioux City, 1076 ft.; and at mouth, 416 ft. Above the junction of the Niobrara R. the M. flows through a region in which comparatively little rain falls, in consequence of which the volume of the river is disproportionately small when the drainage area is considered. Its mean discharge of water per second is 120,000 cubic ft. The length of the river is stated at 2908 m., which, added to the lower Mississippi, gives a total of 4194 m. Area of basin, 518,000 sq. m. [Mississippi].

Mod'ena, the ancient Mutina, fortified city, Italy, Emilia, cap. prov. M., between the Panaro and the Secchia, 15 m. ESE. Reggio, formerly cap. duchy of M., on the Emilian Way; has an observatory (in 44° 38′ 52″ N., 10° 55′ 44″ E.) and a citadel. The ducal palace, a quaint building of the 17th century, has a picture-gallery, gardens, and a library, the Biblioteca Estense, containing 100,000 vols. and 3000 MSS. In a Romanesque cathedral of the 12th century (with curious sculptures and a square marble tower) is preserved the famous wooden bucket, Secchia rapita, the cause of feuds between the Modenese and Bolognese in 1325. Seat of a university founded in 1683, with 25 ordinary and 11 extra-ordinary professors. It is connected by a navigable canal with the Panaro; and has manufactures of hempen and woollen cloths, hats, glass, and leather; its silk manufacture, once important, has declined. It fell to the house of Este in 1288. The antiquary Sigonius was born here in 1520, the anatomist Fallopius in 1523, and the poet Tassoni in 1565. During the French empire under Napoleon I. it was cap. of the dep. Panaro. In 1848 the Duke of M. was deprived of his rights. In 1860 he was expelled, and the duchy was incorporated with the kingdom of Italy. Mean temp., yr. 55.2° F., Jan. 33.8°, July 75.7°; rfall. (1830–91), yr. 27.3 in. P. 31,100.

Moeris, a remarkable lake described by Herodotus as constructed by one of the Pharaohs of the 12th dynasty for the regulation of the water-supply of Lower Egypt. Its existence and position have frequently been discussed in modern times, but it seems now to be generally agreed that it must have included the still surviving lake of Birket-el-Kerun and more or less of the adjoining parts of the Fayum. According to Major Brown, it must have included the whole of the Fayum except certain reclaimed and embanked portions, and must have had an area of about 600 sq. m. Mr. Cope Whitehouse believes that it included also the Raian Basin, a depression on the SW. connected with the Fayum by a trough at the height of 85 ft. above sea-level; but according to Major Brown, the existing deposits at the point where the canal (the Bahr-Yusuf) feeding the Fayum enters that depression show that the Nile can never have risen high enough to enter the Raian Basin, in which, moreover, there are no traces of fresh-water deposits. Mogador', or Suira, seapt., W. ct. Morocco, 128 m. W. by S. Morocco, in 31° 32′ N., about 44 m. SW. of the mouth of the Tensift, on a rocky promontory, surrounded by sand-hills; it consists of three parts, each enclosed by walls, one ('Kasbah') containing the citadel, the residence of the governor and foreign consuls, the custom-house, treasury, &c.; the 'Medina,' or town generally; while the third quarter, or 'Mellah,' is inhabited by the Jewish population. It is well built, and defended by several strong batteries. Olive-oil presses and a steam grain mill are in operation. Its port S. of the citadel (the port of Morocco and all the dist. S. of the Atlas) is sheltered by an island off the shore, and is adapted for only small vessels; it has suffered considerably since the growth of Casa Blanca. Two anchorage grounds in open bay (no bar), first about ¼ m. from landing slip, with 20 ft. of water at low water ordinary springs, the second ⅔ m. from landing slip, with 24 ft. at low water ordinary springs. Exports comprise skins, almonds, olive-oil, bees'-wax, wool, corn, gums, feathers, but the total barely exceeds a quarter of a million sterling. The imports, principally cotton goods, sugar, tea, matches, and hardware, are a little more than the exports. Trade is chiefly with England and France. M. was founded in 1760–73 on the site of a native village, with which the Portuguese and other nations traded, as the old (Portuguese?) fort indicates, and was bombarded by the French, Aug. 15, 1844. M. is a station of the London Jews' Society. Mean temp. (7½ yrs., 1866–71, 1878–79), yr. 66.8° F., Jan. 61.3°, Aug. 71.3°. P. 19,000 (8000 Jews and 300 Europeans).

Mon'aco (Provençal Monègue, hence the name Monégasques given to the inhabitants), independent princip., Europe, enclosed in the French dep. Alpes-Maritimes, 8 m. ENE. Nice, traversed by the railway from Marseilles to the Italian frontier. The port is only a creek for fishers. It is governed by a sovereign bearing the title of prince, assisted by a state council. The possession of this stragetic spot was for a long time the cause of dispute between the lords of the neighbourhood, the most powerful of whom were the Grimaldi, who succeeded in wresting it from the Arabs in the 10th century. During the Revolution and the First Empire it was annexed to France, but was restored to its sovereigns in 1814. In 1848 a revolution caused the loss of Mentone and Roquebrune, which were declared free republics. In 1860 these two towns having chosen French nationality, the prince, Charles III., renounced all rights in consideration of the sum of £160,000. Length, 2 m.; breadth, ½–1 m.; area, 8 sq. m. Mongolia, a wide region of Asia, comprised in the Chinese Empire, mostly between 37° and 53° N., 88° and 126° E., having E. Manchuria, from which it is separated by a wooden palisade, S. and SW. China and Sinkiang, W. Dzungaria, and N. the Russian govts. Tomsk, Yenesei, and Irkutsk, and the Transbaikal prov. M. comprises three great natural divs.: central M., the Mongol Gobi, or stony desert; the Great Gobi, a sandy desert occupying part of the Tarim basin; and an area of transition between the two deserts formed by the sandy districts of Alashan, N. of the Hwang-ho, and Ordos, S. of the great bend of that river. The S. and central part of M. consist chiefly of desert plateau (see Gobi), but (interspersed with some productive tracts, feeding large herds of cattle belonging to nomadic tribes, and where also some wheat, barley, and millet are raised) N. of Urga the surface is hilly, well-wooded, and with wide, fertile valleys. The NW. is mountainous; several ranges, starting from the Kanas group of the Great Altai, run in a more or less parallel direction towards the SE.; of these the three principal are Tannu-ula or Tan-gu, Khangaï, and the Mongol Altai. In the SE. is another mountainous tract, including the Kinghan Mts., continued W. by the Inshan and other ranges, with many intervening valleys. The mountains are formed chiefly of primary rocks (granite, gneiss, &c.), flanked by argillaceous schists and volcanic rocks. The principal rivers flow outward from the margin of the Gobi; in the SE. is the great bend of the Hwang-ho; in the N. are the headstreams of the Kerulen, Selenga, and Yenesei; in the SW. the Tarim falls into Lob-nor, and various other rivers are lost in small lakes, or in the sands of the desert. There are few lakes of importance, the principal being in the NW.: Kosso-gol, Ubsa-nor, and three lakes with connecting channels, Kirghiz-nor, Kara-ussa, or Kobdo, and Durga-nor; in the NE. is Dalaï-nor. The climate varies considerably in different parts; everywhere, but especially in the N., it is subject to great and sudden changes of temperature; the air, however, is dry and very exhilarating, and, on the whole, not unhealthy. In the NW. the prevailing winter winds are the moist NE., but over the rest of the country dry cold NW. winds. Violent storms, including the characteristic dust storms, are frequent in winter; W. winds prevail from April to June. Skin diseases, rheumatism, and diseases of the eye are common. The mineral resources of the country are still undeveloped, mining being strictly prohibited by the government; coal exists in the upper valleys of the Yenesei and other parts of the NW.; saline deposits of various kinds occur in the depressions and marshes. Trade is principally with China proper and, to a less extent, with Russia, to which the Mongols send live stock of all kinds, salt, soda, hides and skins, and timber, receiving in return from the former large quantities of brick-tea, cotton and woollen fabrics, boots, and metallic wares, and from the latter leather goods, stuffs, and hardware, tobacco, brandy, &c. Transport is effected by pack animals and light carts. The camel is the principal beast of burden, but oxen, as being less costly, are used over nearly the whole of M., much of the traffic being carried on by means of ox-carts. Horses are also used, sometimes even in crossing the Gobi. The following are some of the principal trade-routes through M.: From Kalgan, on the frontier of China, to Kiakhta viâ Urga (840 m., Urga 600); Su-chou (Kansu) NW. to Hami (418 m.), thence to Barkul (85 m.); Lan-chou (cap. of Kansu) to Urumtsi (Hung Miotsa) main route viâ Barkul (1300 m.); Hami to Peking, camel-route through desert (1250-1300 m., chiefly used for conveyance of war material); Kweihwacheng viâ N. of Alashan, the Hurku Hills, and Sedereng to Hami and Barkul (55 days' journey); Liangchou across Ordos to Yulin (Shensi) and Taiyuen (Shansi), (26 days). The Mongols (q.v.) have a peculiar physical conformation, which has been taken by ethnologists as the type of a great subdivision of the human race inhabiting most part of Asia E. of the Caspian. They have determined the character of the mixed race we call Tatars. They have long enjoyed a preponderance in Asia, and have been formidable in Europe (see Mongols). They are of the Buddhist religion, and live under various chiefs, who pay tribute to the Chinese emperor, but receive presents from him in return to a much greater amount. M. is divided into a number of chieftainships, these again into banners (military tribes), and these again into regiments, &c. Chief city, Urga. Area (estimated) 1,300,000 sq. m. P. (estimated) 2,000,000.

Mongols (from mong, 'brave,' 'courageous'), a people, central Asia, belonging to the yellow or Mongolian race. The first authentic notice of the M. occurs in the Chinese annals of the Thang dynasty (A.D. 618-907), where they are called Mong-ku, and later Meng-u. Their first great chief was Budantsar, whose origin is enshrouded in fable. The eighth in succession from him was the celebrated Temujin, or Jenghiz-Khan. He began to reign in 1189, soon subdued other large Mongol and Tatar tribes, and extended his conquests to N. China. In 1206 he was proclaimed Great Khan at Tangut, and there assumed the name of Jenghiz-Khan, 'the invincible prince.' Before his death, which occurred in 1227, he had subdued various Turkish hordes, ravaged N. China, conquered Bukhara, overrun Khorassan, Irak, Armenia, and S. Russia. His successor in the empire was Ogotaï, or Ogdai. He annexed a great part of China, conquered Turkistan, advanced westward, and besieged Kars and Tiflis. His nephew, Batu, carried the Mongol arms into Europe, took Moscow and several other towns in central Russia, and had even advanced to Hungary and taken Pesth (1241), when he was recalled on the death of Ogotaï. After a period of disturbance Mangu became emperor in 1251. The first European mission to central Asia visited his court at Karakorum (q.v.). Mangu invaded Tibet and Indo-China, while his brother, Hulagu, led an army into Mesopotamia and Syria. The reign of his successor, Kubilaï, marks the zenith of Mongol power. In 1279 he overthrew the Sung dynasty in China, and established in its place that of the Mongols. His empire extended from the Dnieper to the Sea of Japan, and from Siberia to the Malay Penin. His court was visited by Marco Polo, who spent 17 years at it. In 1368 the M. dynasty was expelled from China, and in 1388 the last Great Khan, Ussakhal, was slain in battle and his army destroyed. With the fall of Ussakhal the united Mongol empire ceased, though new empires were founded by sections of the M. The nominal supremacy passed to the Kalmucks or W. Mongols, some of whose tribes played an important part in history. Bukhara continued in the family of Jenghiz-Khan, and from thence, in 1505, Sultan Baber set out for the conquest of Hindustan (India), where he established the dynasty of the Great Moguls. Western	27,997	64,866
Southern	199,512	66,156
Monmouth Dist. of Boroughs,[1] parl. bor.	8,282	58,720
Total	341,688[2]	252,416[2]

[1] Comprising the Contributory Boroughs of Monmouth, P. 5470; Newport, P. 51,803; and Usk, P. 1447.

[2] The administrative county includes also the part of Ebbw Vale urban sanitary dist. in the ancient county of Brecknock, the part of Rhymney dist. in that of Brecknock, and the part of Tredegar in that of Brecknock. Area, 347,011 ac. P. 258,054.

The surface is very varied, rising in W. and N. to a mountainous district, with the summits: Sugar Loaf, 1954 ft., Blorenge, 1908 ft., and Skyridd Vawr, 1601 ft.; the coast being two broad marshy tracts requiring embankments to protect them from the sea. Chief rivers, the Wye, forming the E. boundary, the Monnow, which joins the Wye at Monmouth, the Usk, flowing S. through the centre of the county, the Rumney, forming the W. boundary. The geological floor is mainly Old Red Sandstone (in the E. half of the county), and Carboniferous limestone in the W., with an outcrop of Silurian rocks near Usk. Near the Wye some limestone formations from Gloucestershire cover the Old Red Sandstone, and give rise to the famous scenery of that region. The Carboniferous system of the W. half includes the rich coal-measures (area, 90,000 ac.), millstone-grit, limestone, beds of red and brown sandstone, marls, &c. Ironstone is found in beds and in large masses; chief blast-furnaces at Newport and Blaina. The important coal-mining centres (with seventy-four mines under inspection) are: Abercarn, Pontypool, Nantyglo, Blaina, Tredegar, Ebbw Vale, and Rhymney. The S. Wales railway is along the coast, and there are branch lines of the G. W. R. and L. & NW. R., besides communication by canals. Except in the mountainous parts there is much fertile soil, the Usk valley being noted for its quality of wheat. The coast levels have a deep loam, suitable for timber. (For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 7–9.) In this county are many traces of the Roman occupation, as at Isca Silurum, now Caerleon = Caer Legionis, one of their chief stations. M., and more particularly Caerleon, are intimately associated with the King Arthur of Britain cycle of romances. Of Norman fortresses, the chief remains are Caldicot, Chepstow, Newport, Abergavenny, &c. The ruined abbeys of Tintern and Llanthony are also famous. Monmouth only became an English county in 1535, being previously under the Lords of the Marches; and Welsh is still largely spoken. In the registration county, which includes most of the Forest of Dean proper (the S. portion of the Forest of Dean div.), in Gloucestershire, as well as parts of the counties of Hereford, Glamorgan, and Brecknock, upwards of 39,500 out of a total of 257,200 above two years of age spoke Welsh at the census of 1891, although the majority of these also spoke English. M. county is an archdeaconry in the diocese of Llandaff. It returns three M.P.'s (divs. N., W., and S.); and the bors. Monmouth, Newport, and Usk return one member. See England, table.

Monta'na, one of the United States of America, the northernmost of the Rocky Mt. states of western group, separated from Canada by the parallel of 49° N., and reaching from the Dakotas to the Bitter Root Mts., on the Idaho border. The Missouri Range of the Rocky Mts. (average elevation 8000 ft.) cross the state from NW. to SE., and form the watershed between tribs. of the Missouri R. and those of the Columbia system. The Yellowstone and Big Horn Mts. extend southward into Wyoming. There are also numerous secondary ranges, with enclosed valleys in the W. The Little Rocky, the Belt, and the Powder R. ranges rise from the eastern plains, which descend gradually, but nowhere to a lower elevation than 3000 ft., save in the valleys of the Missouri and Yellowstone Rivs. Besides the streams mentioned, the Powder, Big Horn, Gallatin, Madison, Jefferson, and Milk flow N. and E.; the Bitter Root and Clark's Fork, with Fleethead Lake, to the W. The upper courses of many streams abound in cascades, the Great Falls of the Mo. being a series descending 160 feet. Cañons abound, some cut in basalt, there being extensive beds and many peaks of eruptive rock. A small part of the Yellowstone National Park lies within M. Navigation is possible upon the Mo. up to Fort Benton (alt. 2694 ft.), and at times upon the Yellowstone. The climate is dry, healthful, and normal in temperature [Virginia City, Fort Benton]. The principal crops are oats, wheat, and barley, grown in the western valleys. The use of irrigation is increasing, but chiefly to grow forage for cattle. Sheep grazing is carried on in the E. without difficulty. Mining interests are the most important. Montana's output of copper in 1892 was more than half the U.S. total The mines are near Butte, the concentrating and smelting works at Anaconda. Silver is found with the copper, and with lead in several counties, the output rising from £300,000 in 1883 to upwards of £4,000,000 in 1891. Gold-mines yield less than one-fourth of the value of the silver production. Good bituminous coal is mined, chiefly in Park and Cascade cos. Other mineral products were lead, iron ore, and antimony. Timber and flour are the chief manufactures. Two railroads that lead from St. Paul (Minn.) to the Pacific coast pass through M. The capital is Helena; other chief places, Butte, Anaconda, Missoula, Bozeman, Great Falls, Livingston. The population is about one-fourth foreign born. Education is at a disadvantage among a scattered population, but is steadily improving. The College of M. is at Deer Lodge, M. University at Helena. M. is part of the Louisiana Purchase, was made a territory in 1864, and a state in 1889. Area, 146,080 sq. m. P. 132,159. [C. H. L.]

Montenegro, the Italian equivalent of the native Crnagora, and the Turkish Kara Dagh, each meaning 'Black Mountain,' and almost certainly pointing to the dark forests which formerly covered the country, is an independent principality on the W. of the Balkan Penin., between Bosnia and Herzegovina on the NW., Albania on the SE., and Dalmatia and the Adriatic (for 28 m. only in the extreme S.) on the SW. The area is given officially as 3255 sq. m., and is estimated at 3500 sq. m., being less than the united counties of Kent, Surrey, and Sussex. M. embraces three characteristic regions: (1) The Karst, consisting chiefly of Triassic and Cretaceous limestones, and extending over the W., N., and middle parts, is a monotonous, bare, stony wilderness, 2500 to 5000 ft. in alt., and reaching 8147 ft. in Mount Dormitor (N.). It has a rolling surface, with numerous oval-shaped depressions (dolinas) and deep fissures, a severe climate, subject to great extremes (104° F. in summer), sparse vegetation (grass, scrub-oak, and beech), and few streams. Some of these travel long distances underground; the Piva (40 m.) is the longest river. (2) The E. side, called Brda, has a mean alt. of 4000 to 4500 ft., and consists of Triassic and Palæozoic schists, cleft by deep, narrow valleys; it is well watered, chiefly by the Tara (45 m.) and the Lim (20 m.), well wooded with beech, oak, and Coniferæ; has a more equable climate than the Karst, its warm valleys producing much fruit (apples, pears, plums, nuts, melons, grapes), tobacco, corn, maize, and potatoes. (3) The coast belt and the low valleys of the Morača (50 m.), Zeta (30 m.), Ryeka, Crmnica, and Siyevna, all open to the sun, rich in fertile soil and in water, and well-cultivated. Here grow evergreen shrubs, and two harvests are generally reaped in the year, chiefly of fruits (grapes, olives, figs, pomegranates, mulberries, almonds) and corn. Two-thirds of the lake of Scutari, in the S., belongs to M. The yearly mean of the climate ranges from 61° F. at Dulcigno on the coast to 28.5° on the E. plateaux. The most characteristic form of the fauna is the cuckoo; there occur also the brown bear, wolf, fox, chamois, deer, hare, marten, birds of prey, aquatic and song birds, frog, tortoise, lizard, viper, chafers, butterflies, insects. The principal fish is the bleak (scorantza); trout and salmon also exist. The wealth of the people consists in sheep, cattle, goats, swine, horses, bees. Wine is made, and fire-arms and ammunition manufactured. Mountain roads connect the principal towns, Cetinje (capital), Ryeka, Podgorica, and Nikšić; otherwise there exist only rough mountain paths. There are 300 m. of telegraphs, but no railways. The total annual trade, both exports (sumach, fruits, animal products) and imports (grain, gunpowder, glass, groceries, cloth), does not exceed a quarter of a million sterling, and is almost entirely in Austrian hands. The government is a hereditary principality, exercised under patriarchal conditions, and controlled by popular custom. The prince is assisted by a council of state and a ministry. Every male is trained to arms. P. estimated at 160,000 (Schwarz) and at 200,000 to 250,000 (Hassert), all of Servian descent, except 5000 Albanian Catholics, and nearly all of the Orthodox Greek Church. The monastery of Ostrog, in the Zeta valley, attracts several thousands of pilgrims every year. During the last quarter of the 19th century education made great progress, partly under Russian encouragement. History.—The Montenegrins are the descendants of those Servians who, after the battle of Kossovo (1389), refused to submit to the Turks, against whom they have waged implacable war ever since. Between 1516 and 1851 the head of the state was the prince-bishop (vladika); before and after that period a secular prince. The area of the terr. was doubled by the Treaty of Berlin (1878). Authorities.—B. Schwarz, Montenegro (2nd ed., Leipzig, 1888); Hassert, Reise durch Montenegro (Vienna, 1893); W. Montevideo (Spanish, 'view mountain'), seapt. and cap. of the republic of Uruguay, S. America, on the N. side of the Plata, 120 m. E. by S. of Buenos Aires, its chief rival as a commercial city on the river, in 34° 54′ S., 56° 12′ W. (cathedral). The city is built partly on a promontory projecting W. across the entrance of the semicircular Bay of M., partly on the point of land which intervenes between the bay and the Atlantic on the E. It is one of the handsomest cities in S. America, having broad streets and fine squares, and being well-drained, well-lighted (electricity), and supplied with water from the riv. Santa Lucia, 12 m. to the NW. The public buildings, most of them handsome, modern, and architecturally imposing, include the Parliament House, town-hall, Solis theatre, school of arts and sciences, custom-house, exchange, hospital, cathedral, Uruguay Club, national university, with nearly forty professors, banks, &c. The houses are mostly flat-roofed. On the opposite, or W., side of the bay is Villa del Cerro, a conical hill, 486 ft. high, surmounted by a lighthouse (34° 33′ S., 56° 15′ W.) and an old fort, and having at its foot large slaughter-houses for cattle. The city has but little manufacturing energy; its chief active interests are commercial. Nevertheless there are no docks or quays. The bay, which is open from SW. to SE., and exposed to heavy gales from that direction, affords only insecure anchorage, in depths varying from 23 ft. in its entrance to 12 ft. near its N. extremity; indeed, the depth is said to have diminished 5 ft. in seventy years. There are no tides, but a maximum variation of about 7 ft. in depth is caused by the winds. Large ocean-going vessels anchor outside in the Plata estuary, and load and discharge by means of lighters. But a costly scheme for reclaiming land, and building moles and docks, has been projected. At the foot of the Cerro docks have been planned giving a depth of 24 ft. There, too, is a dry dock having a depth of 17 ft. on sill, width at entrance 40–55 ft., length 450 ft. On the SE. shore of the city of M. is the Mana dry dock, having a depth at entrance of 14 ft., width at entrance 51 ft., length 276 ft. The annual trade value amounts to £10,000,000, of which nearly £6,000,000 for exports, consisting principally of jerked beef, wool, hides, horns, hair, live stock, and skins. The imports consist of grain, piece-goods, machinery, wines and spirits, groceries, paper, &c. The trade is carried on principally with Great Britain (22 per cent.), France (19 per cent.), Brazil (13 per cent.), and the Argentine Republic (11 per cent.). M. was founded in 1726; a century later it became the capital of the new Republic of Banda Oriental; during the early part of the 19th century it was frequently besieged and bombarded, but has fully recovered from its losses. The climate is healthy and agreeable. Mean temp. (10 yrs., 1843–52), yr. 62.2° F., Jan. 73.0°, Aug. 51.6°; rfall. (10 yrs.), 43.6 in. P. The surface is that of an elevated basin rising to mountains on all sides, on N. to the Berwyn chain, E. the Breidden hills, S. the Kerry hills, and SW. the Plynlimmon range, whose chief summit is in Cardigan. The Wye rises in this county, but the chief rivers are trib. to the Severn, which crosses in NE. direction from Plynlimmon. The soil in many valleys is fertile, and the county is noted for the 'merlins,' a breed of small horses, and its sheep, called 'cluns.' (For other agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 7–9.) Geologically the county is Lower Silurian, with some volcanic masses (e.g., Corndon Hill, 1700 ft.) near Welshpool. The lead-mines are important, especially Llanidloes and Llanbrynmair; barytes at Chirbury; slates, Llangynog, Corris, Cemmes; zinc ore at Llanidloes, Llanbrynmair. Woollen cloth and flannel are manufactured at Newtown, Llanidloes, and Welshpool. The M. canal supplies water communication to Shrewsbury and Chester. The Cambrian Rly. traverses the county, besides other branch lines. There are traces of Roman camps, and many cairns and barrows: Offa's Dyke traverses the SE. corner. The county was part of the ancient Powisland, and got its present name from one of the Norman conquerors. M. is partly in the dioceses of Bangor, Hereford, and St. Asaph. It returns one M.P., and the six chief towns, as parl. bor., return another. Co. P. (1851) 67,300; (1871) 67,600; (1891) 58,000.

Montpellier, cap. dep. Hérault, France, cap. arr. M., on the Lez, 17 m. NE. by N. Cette, 29 m. SW. by W. Nîmes. It is situated on the slope of a hill, and has a university academy, a cathedral, a school of engineers, a seminary, with schools of medicine and pharmacy, an agricultural college, a sericultural institute, museums of painting and sculpture, public library of nearly 100,000 vols., observatory, and a botanic garden, founded in 1593, the oldest in France, and after that of Paris the richest in exotic plants. It was built in the 10th century near the ruins of three towns (Substantion, Lattes, and Maguelonne), the populations of which it absorbed. The kings of Aragon possessed the rising town, and established here in the 12th century schools of law and medicine (the latter of which acquired great celebrity), and in 1292 a university. In 1536 the bishopric of Maguelonne was transferred here. Louis XIII. took it from the Protestants in 1622. M. attracts many strangers by its economical and literary advantages, but it has lost its prestige as a resort for invalids. Birthplace of King Jayme I. of Aragon and the philosopher Auguste Comte. Montreal (-awl'), chief city and commercial cap. of Canada, principal port of entry and centre of the railway system, on the SSE. side of an island of same name in the riv. St. Lawrence, on a series of natural terraces at the foot of Mount Royal (Mont Royal, the origin of its name). The island is formed by the junction of the riv. Ottawa with the St. Lawrence. M. is divided into an upper and a lower town; the latter, along the river, being the trading quarter, the former the residence of the principal merchants; and the slopes of Mount Royal furnish a public park of 430 ac., with fine drives and magnificent views. The chief churches are the Roman Catholic cathedral of Notre Dame, St. James Cathedral (Episcopal), Christ Church (Presbyterian), St. Paul's, Erskine, St. James (Methodist), St. Andrews, &c. There are three large hospitals, banks, ordnance office, merchants exchange, four market houses, Nelson's column, and a bronze statue of Queen Victoria. Besides the M'Gill University (charter, 1821) there is a branch of the Laval University of Quebec, the seminary of St. Sulpice (founded 1657), the Presbyterian, Diocesan, Wesleyan, and Congregational colleges, and other wealthy educational institutions. M. returns three members to the Canadian House of Commons, and three to the provincial legislature of Quebec. Its solid limestone quays, uniting with the locks and wharves of the Lachine Canal, present several miles of continuous masonry, forming a harbour for ocean-going steamers of the deepest draught. The two dry docks have each a length of 200 ft., and a depth on sill at high water ordinary springs of 10½ ft. Extensive harbour improvements now (1895) being made. Victoria Bridge, which conveys the line of the Grand Trunk Rly. of Canada across the St. Lawrence, is tubular, 10,284 ft., or nearly 2 m. long, the central span being 350 ft. It has canal communication with Lake Superior, Lake Huron, and the towns of Chicago, Milwaukee, Buffalo, Toronto, &c.; and at least twelve trans-Atlantic steamer companies have their headquarters at M. Between 1870–71 and 1892–93 inclusive, the latest date of the closing of the port by ice was Jan. 2nd, and the earliest date of opening March 30th. The chief industries are the manufacture of woollen and cotton goods, indiarubber, ropes, boots and shoes, clothing, tobacco, and works connected with the railways; there are also iron-foundries, sugar-refineries, saw-mills, &c. M. was founded in 1642, and taken from the French in 1760. The great majority of the population are of French origin, and Roman Catholics. Mean temp., yr. 42.8° F., Jan. 13.4°, July 69.8°; rfall. (19 yrs., 1869–88), 26.88 in.; snowfall, 123.99 in. P. (1851) 57,700; (1871) 107,200; (1891) 216,700.

Montrose, ancient Monros ('the promontory on the marshy land'), parl. and royal burgh, seapt., and par., Scot., Forfarshire, on the E. ct., on a penin. between M. Basin and the North Sea, at the mouth of the S. Esk, across which it communicates with its suburb Inchbrayock by a suspension bridge (432 ft. in length between the points of suspension; total length, 800 ft.), 34 m. SW. Aberdeen, on the N. B. R.; headquarters of a fishery dist. extending from Broughty Ferry to Gourdon. Flax-spinning is the chief branch of industry; there is also a large saw-mill and extensive fish-curing yards. M. Basin is an expansion of the S. Esk, about 7 m. in circuit, but shallow. The harbour, however, in the Esk, at high water, spring tides, is accessible for ships drawing about 19 ft., and lined with quays, wet and dry docks. Besides the harbour lights, there is a fine lighthouse on the coast called Montrose Ness lighthouse, visible 18 m. The Mid Links are pleasure-gardens in the town, and between the town and the sea are the East Links, containing one of the best golf-courses in Scotland. M. unites with Arbroath, Brechin, Forfar, and Inverbervie, forming the M. dist. of burghs, in sending one member to House of Commons. Here, in 1296, Baliol is said to have surrendered the Scottish crown to Edward I. of England. Birthplace of the Marquis of Montrose, 1612. Market-day, F. Parl. burgh P. Montserrat', a Brit. W. India isl., Leeward group, between Guadeloupe and Nevis, and 27 m. SW. Antigua, in 62° 7'–11' W., 16° 41' N. Surface mountainous, rising to 2500 ft. above the sea, and broken by numerous chasms. Climate comparatively healthy. Soil light and volcanic. Principal crops sugar and limes, the value of the former export since 1881 varying from £10–20,000, the latter less than half that sum. The lime juice is promptly put into air-tight casks, from which it is clarified and bottled in England. Cap. Plymouth (P. 1475), on the SW. coast. The Legislature consists of the Commissioner and a Legislative Council of not more than six members, appointed by the crown, and an Executive Council nominated by the sovereign. The roadstead is an open one, with good anchorage in 5 fathoms (shelving rapidly off to 20 fathoms). Vessels are loaded and discharged by boats carrying 1½ to 4 tons. The island was discovered and named by Columbus in 1493; colonised by the English in 1632; taken by the French in 1664, but restored to the English in 1668; it capitulated to the French in 1782, and was finally restored to the English in 1784. Length about 11 m.; greatest breadth, 7 m.; area, 37½ sq. m. P. (1871) 8693; (1881) 10,083; (1891) 11,762 (whites, 204).

Mora'va, riv., Austria. See March.

Mora'va (ancient Margus), riv. of Servia, flows N. and enters the Danube 30 m. ESE. Belgrade. It is formed by the junction (36 m. NNW. Niš) of two streams—the Bulgarian M., which rises on the Kara Dagh in the Turkish vilayet Kossovo, and has a length (to confluence) of 160 m.; and the Servian M., which rises in the Golija Planina, on the SW. frontier of Servia, and flows N. and SSE., being joined on the way by the Ibar and Rasina (both right). The principal tribs. of the Bulgarian M. are the Nišava and Moravica (right), and the Jablanica and Toplica (left). The united stream, which has no tribs. of importance, is 100 m. long from the confluence, and was formerly navigable to Cuprija, though now obstructed by deposits.

Moravia, Ger. Mähren, crownland and border co. (markgrafschaft) of the Austrian-Hungarian kgd., in the N., between Bohemia, Silesia, Hungary, and Lower Austria. It forms a compact terr., bordered by mountains on nearly all sides—on the NW. by the terraces and heights (peaks 1590–2740 ft.) of the Mährische Höhe (Moravian Heights), on the N. by the Altvater chain (to 4800 ft.) of the Sudetic Mts., and on the E. by the Weisse Gebirge (White Mts., to 3345 ft.) and the Beskids (4110 ft.), W. extensions of the Carpathians. About 90 per cent. of the surface is drained by the March and the streams of its basin—the Thaya, Iglawa, Schwarzawa, Zwittawa, and Beczwa—into the Danube. The Oder drains the NE. corner in the opposite direction. The climate shows a considerable range of difference between the mountainous N. and the comparatively low S. The rfall. is not over abundant, 19½–31½ in. annually. M. is essentially an agricultural region, nearly 71 per cent. of the area being under cultivation; rye and oats are the principal crops, supplemented by wheat, barley, leguminous plants, potatoes, beetroot, vegetables, and fruits (plums, &c.). Wine is grown in the S. Of the remaining surface, 27 per cent. is covered with forests (oak, beech, and Coniferæ), mostly on the mountain sides. Large quantities of coal are mined, chiefly in the extreme NE. and in the middle of the country (neighbourhood of Brünn). Iron and graphite are also mined in appreciable quantities. M. is one of the principal industrial parts of the kingdom. The most important branches are woollens, cottons, and beetroot sugar. Linens, silks, lace, iron goods, leather, glass, spirits, beer, malt, and chemicals are likewise manufactured on a pretty large scale. An active trade is carried on in agricultural and manufactured products (exported), and in salt, groceries, and raw materials for manufacture (imported). The population consists for the greater part of Slavs, i.e., Czechs or Moravians, to the extent of fully 70 per cent. The rest are mostly of German race. The predominant creed is Roman Catholicism, confessed by 95 per cent of the people. The largest towns are Brünn (the cap.) with nearly 100,000 inhabitants; and, with each between 10,000 and 50,000 inhabitants, Mährisch-Ostrau, Iglau, Prossnitz, Olmütz, Neutitschein, Sternberg, Znaim, Prerau, Kremsier, and Mährisch-Schönberg. History.—The Slavs supplanted Germanic tribes in M. in the 6th century. In the beginning of the 10th century the principality (or duchy) of M. was subdued and divided between the Hungarians and the Bohemians (Czechs). M. proper has since that time been intimately connected with Bohemia (q.v.), and with it in 1526 was enrolled amongst the territories of Austria. See table at Austria-Hungary.

Morbihan ('the little sea.' See Mor), dep. France, named from the Gulf of M., formed in 1790 from part of W. Bretagne; divided into four arrs.: Vannes (cap.), Lorient, Ploërmel, and Pontivy; SW. washed by the Atlantic, with a coast-line, exclusive of indentations, of about 93 m. Principal openings from SE. to NW.: estuary of the Vilaine, Bay of M., Bay of Quiberon, partly shut off from the ocean by the penin. of Quiberon, inlet of Etel, estuary of the Blavet. Off Quiberon are Belle Isle and the islets of Houat and Hoedic, and off the mouth of the Blavet, Groix. Surface diversified in parts by chains of hills, mainly of primitive rocks. The culminating point (975 ft.) occurs in the NW., in a continuation of the Montagne Noire of Finistère, general slope N. to S.; plateaux predominate, in part covered with landes, of which the most extensive is the lande of Lanvaux, stretching for about 31 m. between Saint-Jean-Brévelay and Rochefort-en-Terre. Principal rivs.: Vilaine, in the S., with its canalised r. bk. trib.; Oust, which traverses the dep. from NW. to SE.; the Blavet, also canalised above Hennebont, drains the NW., r. bk. trib. Scorff; the Laita forms part of the boundary between M. and Finistère. Forests, Lanouée and Camors. Climate mild and equable. The principal cereals are rye, wheat, and buckwheat; other cultures are hemp, and to a less extent flax; the vine is cultivated only in the arr. of Vannes; apples are extensively grown, the dep. being one of the foremost in the production of cider. Salt from the coast marshes is the chief mineral product. The leading industries are those connected with armaments, of which Lorient is the centre. Fishing and oyster culture occupy many of the coast population. Area, 2739 sq. m. P. (1891) 544,500. See France, table.

Morocco (Italian Marocco, Spanish Marruecos, German Marokko, French Le Maroc, Maghreb al Aksa, or 'furthest west,' of the Arabs), a sultanate or empire in N. Africa, the last of the independent Barbary States, and the most primitive in sight of Europe. It is bounded on the Mediterranean side by Algeria. On the Atlantic side its limits are usually drawn at the Wad Draa, though how far the country stretches thence eastward is disputed, France claiming the Tuat oases, and Spain much of the Sahara southward. None of M. has been accurately surveyed, and much of it is still unexplored, especially the Atlas (q.v.) valleys and the country S. of that range. A rough estimate puts the area at 220,000 sq. m.; and though a census has yet to be made, the population (Arabs, the mixed races or 'Moors' of the towns, Berbers or aborigines—mostly mountaineers, Jews, Negroes, slaves or descendants of slaves brought, as they still are brought, by the Timbuktu caravans from the Sudan) is computed at less than 4,000,000. The Europeans, mostly Spaniards, do not number more than 2000, and with the exception of three or four in Marakesh (Morocco), Fez, and Al K'sar al Kebir, are confined to the coast towns, the greatest numbers being in Tangier, Tetuan, Larache, Rabat, Casablanca (Dar al Beida), Mazagan, Saffi, and Mogador. The Spaniards possess on the Mediterranean shore the Chaffarinas Is., Melilla, Alhucemas, Gomera, and Ceuta, all 'presidios' or convict settlements; and in the extreme S. Ifni or Santa Cruz de Mar Pequeña, these posts being the survivals of a time when Spain and Portugal held nearly all of the coast line. The purely Morocac towns are all walled, unlighted, incredibly filthy, and with the narrow streets half in ruins owing to the general custom of a son not living in the house which his father inhabited, to the eagerness of the heirs in search of hidden treasure, and to the universal decay which has overtaken the empire. The chief interior towns are Fez (the population of which is variously estimated at from 24,000 to 150,000, one-tenth Jews) and Mekines (30,000), the northern capitals; Marakesh, or the city of Morocco, the S. cap. (60,000); Tarudant, in the prov. of Sus, and Tafilet, on the S. side of the Atlas, which, as the cradle of the present dynasty, is regarded with peculiar affection by the Sultans. The population of the coast towns may be given approximately as follows: Tangier, 25,000; Tetuan, 25,000; Larache (El Araïsh), 8000; Rabat and Sallee, on opposite sides of the Bu-Ragreb R., 21,000; Casablanca, 8500; Mazagan, 6000; Saffi, 8000; and Mogador, 19,000 (8000 Jews and 300 Europeans), though the population varies considerably according to the absence or presence of the court, the Sultan being invariably accompanied by a large army and many slaves and camp-followers: during summer he is always on the march collecting taxes and punishing refractory tribes. The Atlas divides M. into two nearly equal parts, the western facing Europe and the sea, and the eastern and southern facing the Sahara. These sections differ widely. These first is intersected by spurs of the Atlas, so that it is for the most part either mountainous or rolling hill country, with many bare stony plateaux, covered in the N. with heather. The country is, however, intersected with rivers which (Muliya) flow from the Atlas to the Mediterranean and Atlantic (Sebu, Bu-Ragreb, Um'rbia, Tensift, and Sus). None of them are of great size, or navigable. In summer most of them are almost dried up, while in winter they are dangerous torrents, which, in a bridgeless and roadless land, seriously interfere with communication. In the valleys of these rivers and elsewhere are rich plains capable of bearing, with the rudest cultivation, heavy crops of maize, barley, wheat, hemp, henna, oranges, olives, grapes, and other tropical and subtropical products. In the northern part of this area a sufficiency of rain generally falls between October and March; the summer and autumn are usually very dry. In the southern part showers are less regular, several seasons having been known to pass over the rich prov. of Sus without a drop falling, or the country producing food for man or beast. These droughts, coupled with the ravages of locusts, are the cause of the famine years which at intervals have scourged M. The part of the empire on the Saharan side of the Atlas partakes of the characteristics of that region, being dry desert, cultivation and population confined to oases, the rivers few and intermittent in their flow, and in exceptionally rainless seasons ending in 'sebkas' or marshy 'sinks' in the sand. The population is also sparse, ruder, and, if possible, more fanatical than that on the other side of the mountains, most of them being confined to the oases of Figig, Tuat, and Tafilet. All of M. is, however, extremely backward, though of late, mainly owing to European stimulus, some trifling progress has been made in the shape of employing European officers in the army and arsenals. The Sultan is an absolute despot, whose authority is recognised only within the range of his guns. Several chiefs are almost independent, Sus and the Atlas being dotted with their little walled towns and picturesque feudal castles; while the sheriff of Wazan, who claims to be sprung from an older branch of the Sheriffian family—e.g., descendants of Mohammed —than the Sultan, exercises hereditary authority in that town and vicinity. The imperial viziers are the mere favourites of the house, liable to be dismissed and degraded at any moment, while the lives and liberties of every subject are at the mercy of the Sultan, who, as Emir al Mumenin, or 'Prince of True Believers,' is, and not the Sultan of Turkey, recognised by his people as Khalif. The climate of western M. is for most of the year pleasant and healthy. The hot winds from the Sahara, being intercepted by the Atlas, seldom reach it; in summer the temperature rarely rises above 80°, unless in the low lying valleys, or falls in winter to the freezing point, except on the high grounds. Snow, however, lies on the Atlas and its higher spurs all winter; it frequently falls in Fez, and twice within forty years has whitened Tangier. The general aspect of M. is bare, though the mountain scenery is often fine. At one time much of M. was covered with forest, but most of it is now cut down, the summits of the mountains, the sacred groves, and a few wooded tracts, like the forest of Marmora, being about all remaining of the umbrageous region which, according to Ibn Khaldun, stretched between Tripoli and Tangier. The result has been the denudation of the soil along the hillsides, the drying up of many water sources, the contraction of the rivers, as indicated by the terraces on their banks, the disappearance of all the lakes except the marshy lagoons between Amries and the Sebu (which seem due to the gradual elevation of the coast-line), and the general desiccation of the entire country. In the N. the palmetto (Chamærops humilis) scrub covers much of the waste ground, olive groves are frequent, but any date palms seen have been planted. Further S. the date is a regular crop, the plain on which stands the city of M. being covered with them, and nearer the coast the argan (Argania Sideroxylon), a tree peculiar to M., and from which oil used in cookery is extracted, is found in extensive patches. The revenue, entirely in the Sultan's hands, is variously estimated at from half a million to a million and a half, most of it derived from customs, monopolies, taxes, tithes, and presents (or exactions). The chief exports are maize, beans, peas, almonds, a little wheat (under special regulation), a specified number of cattle to Gibraltar (by treaty, the export of all other quadrupeds being solely by imperial permits), barley, gums, and wool; and the imports, cotton goods, sugar, tea (coffee not being much used by the Moors), candles, woollen fabrics, &c. (for which see tables). Mines of iron, silver, gold, manganese, antimony, and other metals exist, but are not worked, and their examination by Europeans jealously prevented. The army consists of about 10,000 troops disciplined after the European style, and an indeterminate series of levies from the different tribes, capable of bringing 200,000 men into the field. There is now no navy, but two gunboats are, it is understood, in course of construction to replace the old pirate fleets which were for so long the scourge of Christendom. Moscow, govt. of central Russia, has Tver on NW., Vladimir and Ryazañ on E., Tula and Kaluga on S., and Smolensk on W. Surface undulating, 500–850 ft. of alt. Built up of Upper and Lower Carboniferous limestones, containing coal and marbles, Jurassic clays and sandstones, which yield china-clay, sandstone for building, and sands used for glass; all covered with boulder-clay and alluvial deposits. Watered by Volga, which touches N. border, Sestra, a navigable trib. of Oka, and Moskva, which rises in Smolensk, reaches the Oka at Kolomna, and is navigable from Moscow. Large quantities of corn, flour, salt, &c., as well as timber and fuel-wood, are shipped on the Moskva, to the capital, as also stone from Myachkovo quarries. Soil of moderate productivity. Population almost entirely Great Russian; chiefly engaged, in addition to agriculture, in extraction of coal and building-stone, and manufactures, or in an endless variety of cottage industries—textile, hats, furniture, toys, hardware, &c., in which great technical ability is displayed. Nearly 200,000 persons find employment in the large factories, which produce one-fourth part of the production of European Russia. Considerable trade is carried on, not only in the capital, but also in the towns and villages of the govt. Divided into thirteen dists.: Moscow, Bogorodsk, Bronnitsy, Ruza, Kolomna, Serpukhov, Podolsk, Zvenigorod, Mozhaisk, Volokolamsk, Klin, Dmitrov, and Vereya. Voskresenk, Sergievskiy Posad, at the monastery of Troitsa, Pavlovskiy Posad, and many villages are important industrial and commercial centres. Mean temp., yr. 39.0°, Jan. 13.1°, July 66.2°. Area, 12,859 sq. m. P. (1873) 1,913,700; (1890) 2,240,900.

Moscow (Russian Moskva), second cap. of the Russian Empire, chief town of above govt. and of dist. of same name, situated in 55° 45′ N., 37° 37′ E., in the N. of the most densely peopled parts of European Russia, 400 m. from St. Petersburg, 935 m. from Odessa and Astrakhan, 1000 m. from Orenburg, and 811 m. from Warsaw. It lies on several hills, 500–850 ft. above the sea, on both banks of the Moskva, which describes two great bends as it flows through the city; it covers 32 sq. m. (40 m. with suburbs), i.e., 7 m. N. to S., and 9 m. W. to E. In the centre, on l. bk. of Moskva, stands the Kreml, an old pentagonal fortress, enclosed by a high, now restored, wall 2430 yards in length, with eighteen towers profusely decorated, and all of different architecture. Within the Kreml are the most venerated cathedrals of Russia: Uspenskiy, built in 1475–79 by Fioraventi; Arkhangelskiy, built in 1333, and rebuilt in 1505, containing the tombs of the Tsars from the 14th to the end of 17th century; and Blagovyeshchenskiy, all three possessing some of the most precious relics and holy pictures venerated all over Russia; as also the Voznesenskiy convent, which was the burial-place of the wives and sisters of the Tsars; the Chudov monastery, the centre of old Russian learning, with the 271 ft. high (328 ft. including cross) campanile of Ivan Velikiy, and the immense broken bell, Tsar-Kolokol, 60 ft. in circumference, lying at the foot of the campanile. The library and the treasury of the Patriarchs, the treasury of the Tsars (Granovitaya and Oruzheinaya Palatas), and the churches of the Kreml, contain most remarkable monuments of Russian archæology. The great palace of the Emperors, built in 1849, is a fine building overlooking the Moskva. At one of the gates to the Kreml stands the chapel of the Virgin of Iberia. Round the Kreml the chief public buildings of M. cluster. The Kitai-Gorod, in the E., is the centre of commercial activity, and contains the Gostinyi Dvor (covered galleries with over 1200 shops), the Exchange, all banks and houses of great commercial firms, and the remarkable printing office and old library of the Synod. The Pokrovskiy cathedral, better known as Vasiliy Blazhennyi, renowned for its fantastic architecture, rises close to the walls of the Kreml. The Byelyi Gorod, also surrounded by an old wall, lies in the N., and has the university, the Rumyantseff public museum, renowned for its anthropological collections, and the large military riding school. These three divisions are surrounded by what was formerly known as Zemlyanoi Gorod, enclosed by an earthen wall, now transformed into a succession of pretty boulevards; while on the S. side of the Moskva spreads the Zamoskvoryechiye, chiefly inhabited by merchants and artisans. The climate of M. is cold, but dry and healthy. The average temps. are: yr. 40.1° F., Jan. 14°, July 66.5°, summer 64.2°, winter 15.8°. Prevailing winds SW. and W. Yearly rainfall, 21.1 in. (May–Sept. 11.6 in.). The Moskva remains frozen for an average of 153 days (Nov. 12 to April 13). Drinking water is partly supplied from Mytishchi, 11 m., and partly from the Moskva and Yauza. M. has many educational institutions; a university (4100 students), a theological academy, a high and many lower technical schools, an agricultural institute, an Oriental institute, and numerous colleges, professional and primary schools, as well several well-known scientific societies and museums. The purest Russian is spoken at M., which was the birthplace of Pushkin, Lermontoff, Griboyedoff, Ostrovskiy, and Herzen; it also has the best Russian theatre. Moscow and its suburbs are the chief manufacturing centre of Russia, and have no less than 9820 industrial establishments (15,500 smaller ones), of which 170 cotton-mills, 90 manufactories of woollens, 70 of silks, 70 of metal goods, as well as many large tanneries, candle-works, carriage factories, and a countless variety of petty trades. It is also the chief centre for railway traffic in Russia, six main lines radiating from it to Warsaw, St. Petersburg, Vologda and NE. Russia, Ryazañ, and all SE. Russia, as also Caucasus and Siberia, and Orel, whence they radiate towards Poland, the SW. and Crimea. The quantity of goods and passengers carried from M. in these six directions attains one-fifth to one-fourth of the total railway traffic of Russia, while the revenue of the M. custom-house is double that of St. Petersburg. The amount of interior trade is immense, as M. is the chief centre for trade in manufactured goods, as also in cereals. Beautiful suburbs and parks surround M., and several monasteries and convents of historical importance are scattered around the capital. The chief suburbs are the Sokolniki (4½ sq. m.) and Mariina forests, as also Preobrazhenskiy (Nonconformists) and Izmailovo, in N.; Petrovskiy park, Petrovskoye-Razumovskoye (agricultural academy, botanic garden, &c.); Ostankino, Kuzminki, and Kuntsevo, as also Savvin-Storozhevskiy, and New Jerusalem monasteries in SW.; the Novo-Dyevichiy convent, Arkhangelskoye and Iliinskoye villages in SW.; Kolomenskoye, and Tsaritsyno villages and the Nikolo-Ugryeshskiy monastery in S. In 1147 M. was but a small village, and for the next 150 years it remained a dependency of Vladimir, the Mongols burning and plundering it in 1237 and 1293. Under Daniil, son of Alexander Nevskiy (1261–1302), it began to acquire importance. The Kreml, protected by an earthen wall, was built in 1300, and a stone wall erected in 1367, i.e., the year after M. had been taken by Tokhtamysh. From the 14th century to the end of the 17th, the history of M. is the history of Russia. By the end of the 16th century it was already a large city, 14 m. in circumference, carrying on an important trade. Three consecutive conflagrations destroyed it in 1739, 1748, and 1753. It was occupied by Napoleon I. on Sept. 13, 1812, six days after the battle of Borodino, and the same night a terrible conflagration destroyed the Gostinyi Dvor, gradually spreading to the excen-tric quarters, and compelling the French to evacuate the city on October 19th. The population is steadily increasing; it is chiefly Great Russian, and contains less than 10,000 foreigners. Total P. 822,000.

M. remained free from fever for 10 years after its foundation, and is still on the whole healthy, though fever began to show itself after the soil had become polluted. Fever is liable to occur chiefly in April and May, at other times uncommon. Changes of temp. are rapid and varied. The harbour has a good pier, at which goods can be loaded and discharged at any state of the tide. Lighthouse, visible 15 m., on Point Giraul ('fine point'), at the N. end of the bay. Connected by telegraph cable with Cape Town, Benguella, Loanda, and Lisbon. Vegetable and fruit gardens at Hortas, about an hour's distance to the N. Mosul, walled tn., Asiatic Turkey, on the r. bk. of the Tigris (here 800 ft. wide), 220 m. NNW. Bagdad, cap. vilayet and sanjak M.; streets narrow and irregular; houses of stone and brick, lofty and flat-roofed, with solidly built underground rooms for summer use. From its manufactures of cotton cloths the word muslin is derived, but these are now supplanted in its bazaars by European goods. It exports gall-nuts. Owing to modern changes in the Oriental routes of communication, and to the unruly Kurds on the N. and Bedouins on the S., M. occupies an exposed situation, and its trade has suffered in consequence. It is the seat of a Jacobite patriarch, and was formerly the metropolis of the Mesopotamian Christians. A stone bridge crosses the Tigris to an island, on the further side of which a bridge of boats continues the communication with the l. bk., and the plateau upon which Layard discovered many interesting remains of ancient Nineveh (q.v.). In the same vicinity tradition points out the grave of the prophet Jonah. The town's period of greatest prosperity was 10th–13th centuries. Alt. 400 ft. Mean temp. Mozambique, Portuguese colony in E. Africa; it extends from Cape Delgado to the Delagoa Bay, and is bounded on the W. by British Zambezia, the South African Republic, and Swaziland. The coast is flat and swampy, but towards the interior the country gradually rises, and is covered with forests. Principal rivers, Rovuma, Zambezi, Pungwe, Sabi, Limpopo. Climate unhealthy to Europeans. The native population consists of various Bantu tribes, whose principal occupation is agriculture (maize cultivated in large quantities). Chief exports, cotton, oil-nuts, oil-seeds, caoutchouc, ivory, indigo, gum, coffee, wax, tobacco, and sugar; chief imports, textile fabrics, alcoholic beverages, and glass-beads. In 1892 the imports were valued at £143,000, and the exports at £88,000. The slave-trade, formerly one of the principal sources of revenue of the colony, is now entirely suppressed. In 1891 the colony was constituted by a decree as the State of E. Africa ('Estado d'Africa Oriental'), and divided into two parts, firstly, the prov. of M., comprising the territories N. of the Zambezi, with the town of M. as cap.; and secondly, the prov. of Lourenço Marquez, S. of the Zambezi, with Lourenço Marquez as cap. Other places of importance, Quilimane, Chiluane, Sofala, Inhambane, Sena, and Tete. The colony has 65 m. of railways. Area, 261,700 sq. m. P. 1,500,000. [H. G. S.]

Munich, German München (name derived from the Latin monachus = monk), cap. of Bavaria, situated in 48° 8′ 45″ N. lat., and 11° 36′ 38″ E. long. M. lies in a monotonous plain on both banks of the Isar, but the Bavarian Alps with their grand scenery rise not far from the town. M. has a great many fine churches, palaces, art-museums, memorials, and statues. The most important of these are the cathedral (Church of Our Lady), the basilica of St. Bonifacius, the royal palace, the old and new town-halls, the beautiful art-museums of the Glyptothek and of the two Pinakotheks, and the colossal statue 'Bavaria' (64 ft. high), besides numerous other buildings, &c., that might be mentioned representing all styles and ages. The majority of these were erected in the first half of the 19th century, during the reigns of the kings Ludwig I. and Maximilian II., to whom the town is also indebted for its splendid art collections, the Glyptothek being a gallery of antique and modern sculptures, and the Old and New Pinakotheks containing exceedingly rich collections of paintings, including masterpieces of all schools. M. is one of the industrial centres of Bavaria (q.v.). Beer-brewing has to be mentioned first in this respect, enormous quantities of beer being annually produced. Moreover, the manufacture of jewellery, gold and silver articles, iron and brass castings, machinery, leather goods, and optical and mathematical instruments are of great importance. The commerce is also considerable, eight railway lines connecting Munich with Austria, Italy, and various parts of Germany. M. is the seat of a much-frequented university (170 professors and docenten, more than 5000 students), and of a technical high school. Moreover, it has a famous academy of arts. Celebrated is the royal library (1,250,000 vols. and 30,000 manuscripts). M. became cap. of Bavaria in the middle of the 12th century, but its progress was very slow till Bavaria was made a kingdom at the beginning of the 19th century, when the old and inattractive capital was transformed by the great efforts of the first Bavarian kings into the beautiful town of to-day. More than 80 per cent. of the inhabitants are Roman Catholics, the rest Protestants. Alt. 1735 ft. Mean temp., yr. 45.0° F., Jan. 27.6°, July 63.7°. P. (1801) 40,000; (1818) 53,000; (1871) 170,000; (1890) 349,000. [H. G. S.]

Murray, the most important river of the Australian continent, rises on W. slopes of the Australian Alps, at 36° 30′ S., and flows W. and N., dividing New South Wales from Victoria for nearly 800 m., when it enters S. Australia, and turning S. reaches the sea by Lake Alexandrina, 48 m. SSE. Adelaide. On its left, 6 m. from Victoria, it receives the Mitta Mitta, Ovens, Broken Creek, Goulburn, Campaspe, and Loddon; and on the r. bk. from New South Wales it is joined by Edward R., the united streams of Murrumbidgee and Lachlan, and by the Darling or Callewatta. In its upper course it flows amid high rocks, and near its source are the Murray Gates, a chasm with perpendicular walls 3000 ft. high, hanging over the stream. The width of the stream from Moama (in long. 145° 40′ E.) to Albury (in long. 147° 10′ E.) is about 80 yards, and it is navigable for about eight months in the year by small steamers as far as the last-mentioned town. Its mouth is too shallow to be entered by anything but small craft, and a railway has been made between Goolwa and Port Elliot in connection with its river steamers and barges. In recent years its water has been largely made use of for irrigation [Mildura, Renmark]. Length about 1100 m.; area of basin, 270,000 sq. m.

This region is divided into the Malnád or hill country in the W., that is, the country belonging to or bordering on the Western Ghâts (Ghâts, Baba Búdan), and the Máidán or open country, occupying the greater part of the surface. The region generally may be described as that of the headwaters of the rivers of southern India. The main water-parting stretches from W. to E. across the middle of Mysore, at the height of about 3000 ft., the ground sloping thence gently northwards and southwards, but rising again in the extreme S. of Mysore towards the junction of the Eastern and Western Ghâts. Most of the rivers in the N. belong to the basins of the Kistna and the Northern Penner, and flows northwards; those in the S. mostly belong to the basin of the Cauvery, and flow some N., some S. In the N. there are the headwaters of the Northern Penner itself, those of the Tunga and Bhadra, which, within the terr. of Mysore, unite to form the Tungabhadra, the principal trib. of the Kistna, and those of the Hagari, or Vedávati, the largest trib. of the Tungabhadra. In the S. the Cauvery takes its rise in Coorg, in a recess of the mountains formed by a westerly curve of the Western Ghâts. Further E. the Pálár and the Southern Penner both take their rise on the southern slopes of the main waterparting. None of the Mysore rivers is navigable, but they are of great service for irrigation, many of the tanks of the region being formed by anicuts (dams) laid across the rivers in suitable places to hold back part of the water. On the Máidán or open country a striking feature is formed by the drúgs (droogs) or precipitous isolated rocky hills which are dotted over the surface, some of them rising to the height of 2000 ft. or more above the surrounding country, 4000 to 5000 ft. above the level of the sea. Many of them contain water at their summit, and formerly were taken advantage of as sites for fortresses, which enabled the owners to domineer over the neighbouring districts. Among those most conspicuous in the history of Mysore are Nandidrúg and Savandrúg, both in the E. (Bangalore district). The rainfall is comparatively scanty (India, climate, Bangalore), and the state has suffered greatly in all the severe famines by which southern Madras (q.v) has been affected. Among the crops of Mysore, grain and oil-seeds occupy about nine-tenths of the cultivated area, the principal grain being rágí, which furnishes the staple food of the bulk of the people. Other millets are also grown in all parts, and rice is cultivated in the S., where water for irrigation can be obtained from rivers. In similar situations occur plantations of sugar-cane. Among other important products of the S. are areca or betel-nut and coco-nut palms. In the N., where black soil occurs, a good deal of cotton is grown. On the slopes of the Ghâts in Mysore and Coorg there is more than three-fourths of the area under coffee-plantations in India. Next in importance to coffee among the hill products are cardamoms (especially in Coorg) and cinchona bark. The narrow valleys which form all the lowland area in Coorg capable of cultivation are almost entirely occupied by rice-fields. The chief mineral in Mysore is gold, one or two mines of which are now profitably worked in the district of Kolár, in the E. of the state. The signs of the occurrence of gold, both here and elsewhere, in Mysore give the promise of even better results in the future. There are two railways in the state. A standard-gauge railway connects Bangalore with the Madras railway system, and a metre-gauge railway in connection with the system of southern Bombay and the port of Marmagáo winds through the state from Harihar on the northern frontier past Bangalore to Mysore. The prevailing language is Kanarese, but Telugu is spoken in a small area in the extreme E. The only towns with more than 20,000 inhabitants in 1891 were Mysore (the cap.) and Bangalore, both of which have British cantonments.

Nagasaki, seapt. tn., Japan, cap. of a ken or sub-province on the W. ct. of Kiushiu, at the head of a beautiful narrow harbour 3½ m. in length. For over 200 years it was the only port where foreigners were allowed to land; in 1859 it became one of the five open ports. The 'Foreign Settlement' occupies the flat eastern shore, with picturesque slopes behind, and opposite are factory works and the dock of Tategami, which has 25½ ft. on sill at high tide ordinary springs, and is 411 ft. long at the bottom, and 89 ft. wide at the entrance. N. of the dock are engine-works, occupying an area of 7 ac. The chief public buildings are the hospital (the oldest in Japan) and a great government college, attended by natives of all classes to learn the languages and sciences of Europe. Nagasaki is noted for the number of its temples, and the magnificence of its festivals. Of the latter, three have often been described: (1) The Kunichi (Oct.), with public rites in the temple of Suwa, display of shrine treasures, games, and stage plays, and solemn processions in costly and splendid dresses and decorations, in which all the streets and districts strive to distinguish themselves; (2) the Bon Matsuri, or Festival of Lanterns; and (3) the Gion, a sort of fair lasting for three days. Owing to a large coal-mine in the island Takashima, off the entrance to the harbour, Nagasaki has become an important coaling station. This is probably the largest colliery in Asia, employing over 3000 men, and (1888) yielding 445,000 tons yearly; much of the coal lies under the sea. Steamers go regularly to Shanghai. Chief exports, coal, camphor, rice, tobacco, dried fish, and vegetable wax; imports, raw cotton, ammunition, sugar, cloth, &c. Mean temp. (13 yrs., 1871–78, 1881–86), yr. 61.1° F., Jan. 42.0°, July 80.5°; rfall. (6 yrs.), 77.6 in. P. (1884) 41,000; (1890) 58,100.

Nairnshire, maritime co., Scot., on the Moray Firth, with 10 m. of sea-coast, having Elginshire on E., and Inverness-shire on W. and S. Till 1891 there were five small detached sections of this county, which are now included in Ross, Inverness-shire, and Elginshire. Like the latter, the county gradually rises from an undulating fertile plain to mountains on the S.; highest point Cairn Glas (at the S. extremity of the county), 2162 ft. The summits generally average 1500 ft. The Findhorn drains the E. and the riv. Nairn the W. In geological structure, as in other features, Nairnshire closely resembles Elginshire, having crystalline rocks, with some granite masses, in the southern high grounds, and on the low ground members of the Old Red Sandstone, with glacial and recent deposits. Much of the soil on the 'laich' or plain is a rich loam. For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 10–12. The H. R. crosses this county from E. to W., and there are excellent roads. The county town is the only royal or police burgh; and Auldearn, the scene of one of Montrose's victories, is next in size, though only a small village. Cawdor and Kilravock castles are in this county, also Culloden. With Elginshire it returns one M.P. The county now contains four entire pars. and part of a fifth; in the synod of Moray. P. Namaqualand, Great (or, according to Schinz, more correctly Namaland), comprises the southern parts of German SW. Africa, N. of the Orange R. It is a desert tract of land, thinly peopled by various Hottentot (q.v.) tribes. The coast belt is a desert of the worst kind, with no water, and hardly any trace of vegetation. Then follow mountain-ranges, rising to alts. of 5000 ft. and running from S. to N., and consisting chiefly of table-mountains peculiar to S. Africa. The river-beds are generally dry, and the rainfall is very scanty. Underground water is much less prevalent than in the adjoining northern terrs. At the few isolated spots where water rises to the surface small settlements exist, of which Bethany and Rehoboth are the principal. Angra Pequeña, on the coast, is of interest, as being the first African colony (founded in 1883) of the German Empire. (See Schlichter: Geography of S W. Africa, Scot. Geog. Mag., 1891.) [H. G. See Belgium.

Namur, Flemish Namen, tn., Belgium, cap. prov. Namur, 34 m. SE. Brussels, occupying an important situation at the confluence of the Meuse and Sambre, whose valleys must always form the main lines of communication with the NE. (Liège), the S. (Dinant and NE. France), and SW. (by the Sambre to Charleroi); formerly fortified (till 1866); a citadel founded in 1691, and rebuilt in 1794 and in 1815, still stands. The numerous sieges which Namur has undergone has destroyed most of its ancient edifices. It was taken by the French in 1692, by the English and French in 1695 (read Sterne's Tristram Shandy), and again by the French in 1701 and 1746. The cathedral, which dates from the middle of the 18th century, is one of the finest in Belgium. Namur is celebrated for its cutlery, and has manufactures of iron, steel, and bronze articles, glass, leather, &c. Alt. 490 ft. Mean temp., yr. 50.3° F., Jan. 36.6°, July 65.5°. P. comm. Nancy, tn., France, cap. of dep. Meurthe-et-Moselle and of arr., and former cap. of Lorraine, on the Meurthe (trib. of Moselle), 30 m. S. Metz, and 14 m. E. Toul. It has handsome squares and streets, especially the Place Stanislaus, named from the ex-king of Poland, who, as Duke of Lorraine, designed the plan and architectural improvements of the 'new town.' There are a cathedral, a university, a lycée, a medical college, centre of one of the two French hypnotic schools, a noted school of forestry, a public library of 70,000 vols., &c. The fortifications were destroyed by Louis XIV. when he annexed the country, but the citadel remained in the 'old town.' Nancy again became French in 1766, and it was occupied by the Allies in 1814–15, and put to ransom by the Prussians in 1870. Its population was greatly increased by immigration from Alsace after the cession of that prov. to Germany. Nancy has greatly grown in importance since the German annexation of 1871; with staple industries in cambric and muslin embroidery, besides those in iron, cotton, woollen, tobacco, &c. It is on the Paris and Strassburg Rly., but is also a junction for other lines. Birthplace of General Drouot, and of the engraver Jacques Callot. Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, was slain in battle against the Swiss just outside the walls in 1477. Alt. 725 ft. Mean temp. (15 yrs.), yr. 50.2 F., Jan. 34.7°, July 66.6°. P. Nanking, or, according to a spelling originally French, Nankin ('the southern capital'), officially Kiangning, city, China, cap. prov. Kiangsu, formerly cap. of the empire, on the r. bk. Yangtse-kiang, 130 m. from its mouth, and 194 geographical m. W. Shanghai. Before its occupation by the Taiping rebels (1853-64) it was famous for its public buildings and its walls, the latter in some places 70 ft. high, and nearly 20 m. in circumference. The chief of the former were the Porcelain Tower, 260 ft. high, the summer palace, and the royal tombs, with colossal sepulchral figures of warriors, elephants, &c. The historical treaty of 1842 was signed at Nanking. The only modern building of importance is an arsenal on the European model. Nanking is the seat of the viceregal government, but seems unlikely to resume its ancient importance. The walls of the original cap. have been traced for 35 m. Manufactures nankeen (from a yellow cotton grown here), satin, and especially cannon and other warlike material. The climate is very malarious to strangers, owing to the surrounding marshes. It still ranks, however, as the literary cap. of China, and has several large libraries and printing offices. The river rises from 12 to 15 ft. in summer. P. 150,000–400,000 (including about 50,000 Moham.), anciently said to have been 4,000,000 under the Ming dynasty.

Nan-shan ('South mts.'), a range, central Asia, stretching SE. and NW. between Tibet and the Gobi, from Lanchou-fu in Kansu to the vicinity of Sa-chou. The eastern part consists of three parallel ranges, but the central apparently of two ranges, enclosing a high plateau, while still further W. these merge into a single chain, with summits rising above the snow-line (highest about 14,000 ft.). A lofty spur, the Humboldt (length, 60 m.), rises to over 16,000 ft., and from it the Ritter chain extends to the Tsaidam plateau. These two ranges were discovered and named by Prjevalsky. To the S. of Lake Kuku-nor, which is regarded by Obruchev as the relic of an old sea, and from native accounts seems to contain a species of seal, the Nan-shan includes the S. Kuku-nor and Semenov ranges. The whole system is in its main features geologically much older than the Tertiary period. The Carboniferous system (with coal-seams) is extensively developed, and contains marine formations raised to an alt. of 18,000–20,000 ft. See Petermann's Mitteil., 1894, pp. 287–90 (from the Russian).

Nantes, city and seapt., France, cap. dep. Loire-Inférieure, on the r. bk. of the Loire (here 2000 yards wide, and tidal), 35 m. from the sea, 248 m. SW. Paris. It has now many handsome boulevards, squares, and quays, mostly new, besides many bridges to the islands on its noble river, and to the suburb on the l. bk., which is largely occupied by factories and shipbuilding yards. The chief buildings of the city are the cathedral, St. Pierre, built 1434–1886, the ducal castle (where in 1598 Henry IV. signed the famous Edict of Nantes), library of 200,000 vols., lycée and normal school, &c. The two chief hospitals are St. Jacques, on l. bk., and the Hôtel Dieu, on one of the river islands. Though more a commercial centre than industrial, there are large manufactures of cotton, wool, and hemp, as well as shipbuilding; also in iron, copper, sugar, and tobacco (see also Indret). The port of Nantes admits vessels of 200 tons, larger ones therefore unloading at St. Nazaire or Paimbœuf. On r. bk. there are 7837 ft. of quayage, 4134 ft. on Île Gloriette, 3820 ft. on the Île Madeleine. Chief exports, bread-stuffs, machinery, sugar, molasses, soap, preserved vegetables (as peas and asparagus), fish (salmon and sardines); imports, coals, timber, raw sugar, cast iron, guano, tar and pitch, oil and oil-seeds. The shipbuilding has been falling off since the rise of St. Nazaire. A ship canal, on the l. bk., now admits large sailing vessels and steamers directly to Nantes. There is a canal to Brest, but the traffic is unimportant. Before the Roman period, when Nantes became a great administrative capital, the Nannetes had their chief town here, and thus originated the name. Under the Revolution the prisons were filled with Véndean prisoners, whose inhuman treatment by Carrier, inventor of the noyade executions, has made his name execrable. The Duchess of Berri was, in 1832, imprisoned in the castle. Mean temp., yr. 52.7° F., Jan. 39.9°, July 65.8°; mean rfall. 25.6 in. P. (1872) 112,900; comm. P. Naples, Italian Napoli, anciently Neapolis, city and seat of an archbishop, Italy, cap. prov. Naples (till 1860 cap. kgd. of the Two Sicilies), on N. shore of the Bay of Naples, and W. base of Mount Vesuvius, 161 m. SE. Rome. (See Naples, Bay of.) Overlooking the city on the W. is the castle of St. Elmo, originally a fort, built 1343. It has four other forts, and four mediæval gates, more than 300 churches, including the cathedral of St. Jannarius; other public buildings are the university (founded 1224), with over 4000 students, and library of 150,000 books, the palace, the law courts, the Royal College of Music, with a teaching staff of nearly forty, the National Library (275,000 books), the Brancacciana Library (150,000 books), and the Borbonico Museum, unequalled for Roman and early Italian antiquities, as well as for its Etruscan and Italo-Greek vases. It has also a famous collection of the objects found at Herculaneum and Pompeii. The chief ancient remains are the catacombs and the Julian aqueduct, called Ponti Rossi. The port of Naples, second in the kingdom (Genoa being first), consists of three parts, separated by moles and piers. The dry dock is 247 ft. long, and at entrance 62½ ft. broad; entrance to harbour over 2000 ft. Exports (over £1,500,000) wine, olive-oil, chemicals and perfumery, hemp and flax, &c.; imports (over £5,500,000) cereals, metals, cottons, woollens, earthenware, glass, &c. Naples is more densely inhabited than the other European great towns, but since 1860 there have been great social and industrial improvements, and the education of the people is no longer neglected. The lazzaroni of former generations, for example, no longer exist. New drainage works, an aqueduct, and many new streets and squares, begun by King Victor Emmanuel, have helped to enhance the attractiveness of this capital, already famous by its climate as well as by its unequalled position and surroundings. Originally a Greek settlement, as the name implies, Naples retained some of the Grecian culture under the Roman rule, and was a favourite residence of many of the emperors and others. Under the Normans it and Sicily were consolidated into one state, a kingdom which existed through the Middle Ages, and was under the Bourbons from 1735 till their expulsion by Garibaldi in 1860, excepting when Joseph Buonaparte and Murat were kings of Naples. In 1861 Naples, with the whole kingdom of the Two Sicilies, became part of the kingdom of Italy. Manufactures unimportant. The neighbourhood has been called the market-garden of Italy, and fishing employs many of the inhabitants. Alt. 489 ft. Mean temp., yr. 61.1° F., Jan. 47.7°, July 76.5°; mean rfall. (1821–91), yr. 32.4 in., June–Aug. 3.1 in. Comm. P. (1788) 404,000; (1871) 448,400; (1891) estimated at 518,000; city P. (1812) 326,100; (1871) 415,500; (1881) 463,200.

Narbonne, tn., France, dep. Aude, cap. of arr., on a branch of the Canal du Midi, 8 m. from the Mediterranean, and 93 m. ESE. Toulouse. It was fortified till 1865, and now the chief objects of interest are the ancient church, the cathedral of St. Just (with a fine Gothic choir 131 ft. high, and towers 194 ft.), and the Hôtel-de-Ville, once an archbishop's palace, utilised for museum and library. The chief products are honey, salt, sulphur, and tiles. The district is also noted for a red wine, which is strongly alcoholic. The proposed Atlantic-Mediterranean ship canal has its E. terminus not far from the town. Narbo was the earliest Roman colony in France, and gave name to Gallia Narbonnensis, flourishing greatly under Tiberius; after the 12th century, when it was a wealthy commercial centre, rivalling Marseilles, Narbonne sunk into comparative obscurity. Natal' (Portuguese='Christmas,' discovered 25th Dec. 1497), British colony in SE. Africa, situated NE. of Cape Colony. Length of sea-coast on Indian Ocean, 160 m. Natal is a mountainous country, rising in three successive terraces from the coast to the Kwathlamba Mts. (q.v.). Rivers, Tugela (with Buffalo R.), Umvoti, Umkomanzi, Umzimkulu, Umtamvuna. The climate differs according to the different elevations of the country. The fertility of Natal is great, the subtropical coast-belt producing sugar, tea, coffee, arrowroot, bananas, and tobacco; whilst on the inland terraces Kafir corn, wheat, maize, and other cereals are grown in large quantities. Pastoral pursuits, especially sheep-breeding, cattle-rearing, and ostrich-farming, are of great importance. The mineral wealth of Natal is considerable; coal is found near the coast, on the Mooi R. and in Klip R. co.; gold, copper, iron, and lead are met with in various parts of the colony. Principal exports, wool, sugar, hides, maize, ostrich-feathers, arrowroot; imports, textiles, flour, rice, ironware, machinery, and leather. Cap. Pietermaritzburg (alt. 2095 ft., P. (1892) 48,000); principal port, Durban; 400 m. of railways, the principal line running from Durban to Pietermaritzburg (72 m.). The roads of the colony are good. There is a weekly mail service with England, and frequent steam communication with the E. African ports and Mauritius. Telegraphs by land to Cape Colony, the Orange Free State, and the S. African Republic; cable connection with Delagoa Bay, Sofala, Mozambique, Zanzibar, Aden, and Europe. History.—Discovered 1497 by Vasco da Gama; 1719, Dutch settlement; 1824, British settlement; 1837, immigration of Boers (Pietermaritzburg founded); 1856, separate colony under the British crown; 4th July 1893, new constitution, governor, ministry of five, legislative council of eleven, legislative assembly of thirty-seven. Area, 20,460 sq. m. P. (1891) 555,276 (42,459 Europeans). [H. G. S.]

Navarre, in Spanish Navarra, prov. in the NE. of Spain, extending from the western Pyrenees to the Ebro, in the SE. (dist. Tudela) for a short distance beyond the Ebro; cap. Pamplona. The northern half or two-thirds (the Montaña), in which the Basque language is still more or less spoken, is mountainous (occupied by spurs of the Pyrenees), and mainly devoted to pasturage; the remainder (the Ribera), in which Castilian Spanish is spoken, diversified lowlands, fertile in cereals, wine, oil, and fruit, but greatly in need of irrigation to make it as productive as it might become. Communication defective. There is no carriage-road across the Pyrenees in the prov., but among the passes is the well-known Roncevaux or Roncesvalles. Iron ore abounds, but is not much worked, and manufactures are backward. There are frequented warm (85°–86° F.) saline mineral springs at Fitero, in the W. of the portion of the prov. S. of the Ebro. The prov. is the Spanish portion of an ancient county erected in 858 into a kingdom which embraced some terr. on the French side of the Pyrenees (now mainly forming the W. portion of the arr. of Mauléon in dep. Basses-Pyrenees), and which attained its greatest importance towards the end of the 15th century, when the kingdom passed into the hands of the counts of Foix, already viscounts of Béarn. In 1512 the kingdom was seized by Ferdinand of Castille, but the portion on the French side remained in the possession of the former king, who retired to Pau, cap. of Béarn, retaining the royal title.
